"What do you find out of the way in it?" asked the student in astonishment.

"Why," returned the waggish old critic, "anybody can read that writing."

A barber desired a groggy customer of his, on Sunday morning, whose breath smelled strong of alchohol, to keep his mouth shut, or the establishment might get indicted for keeping a rum-hole open on Sunday.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the Gospel Tribune his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Lately, his position as Publisher of the Scripture Manual, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the Tribune's Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, Robert Dick, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the Tribune's object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

Men and Brethren:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something else and use those means which [illegible] the attainment of the great and long desired end, to do something to meet the actual [illegible] of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted rights, composing an [illegible] an acknowledged necessary part of the living element of society in which we live. The policy necessary to the preservation of this element must be in our favor, if ever we expect the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American [illegible] of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are hereby [illegible] to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, for a great NATIONAL CONVENTION then and there, to consider and decide upon the [illegible] and important subject of [illegible] United States.

[illegible] is invited to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures and objects set forth in this Call as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration [illegible] and NONE OTHERS and no opposition will be [illegible] countenanced.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be [illegible] otherwise. If not, then, there is no part of the [illegible] where our social and political [illegible] are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures [illegible] the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail at the time fixed for assembling as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention, when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

The following are our only Agents in Hamilton, C. W. T. BICKLE & SON; HAMILTON, KNEESHAW & CO., In Toronto, LYMAN. BROTHERS, & CO., are our general agents—we also sell to SIMPSON & CO.

Poetry.

June.

BY WILLIAM HENRY BURLEIGH.

June with its roses—June!
The gladdest month of our capricious year,
With its thick foliage, and its sunlight clear;
And with the drowsy tune
Of the bright leaping waters, as they pass
Laughingly on amid the springing grass!

Earth at her joyous coming
Smiles as she puts her gayest mantle on;
And Nature greets her with a benison;
While myriad voices, humming
Their welcome to her, to the dreamy music round,
Till seems the air a continent of sound

The over-arching sky
Weareth a softer tint, a lovelier blue,
As if the light of heaven were melting through
Its saphire home on high;
Hiding the sunshine in their cap my breast,
The clouds float on like spirits at their rest.

A deeper melody,
Poured by the birds, as o'er their callow young
Watchful they hover, to the breeze is flung—
Gladsome, yet not of glee—
Music to mother, like that which mothers sing
Above their cradled infants slumbering.

On the warm hill-side, where
The sunlight lingers latest, through the grass
Peepeth the luscious strawberry! As they pass
Young children gathering it,
Crushing the gathered fruit in playful mood,
And staining their bright faces with its blood.

A deeper blush is given
To the half-ripened cherry, as the sun
Day after day pours warmth in the trees upon,
Till the rich pulp is riven
The truant school-boy looks with longing eyes,
And perils limb and neck to win the prize.

The farmer, in his field,
Draws the rich mould around the tender maize
While hope, bright pinioned poised, sings coming days
When all his toils shall yield
An ample harvest, and around his hearth
There shall be laughing eyes and tones of mirth.

Poised on his rainbow wing,
The butterfly, whose life is but an hour,
Hovers coquettishly from flower to flower,
A very and happy thing;
Born for the sunshine and the sweet May day,
Soon passing, like the beautiful, away.

These are thy pictures, June!
Brightest of Summer months: thou month of flowers
First-born of beauty, whose swift-footed hours
Dance to the merry tune
Of birds and waters, and the pleasant shout
Of childhood on the sunny hills peal'd out.

I feel it were not wrong
To deem thou art a type of Heaven's clime,
Only that there the clouds and storms of Time
Sweep not the clouds along;
The flowers—air—beauty—music—all are thine,
But brighter—purer—lovelier—more divine!

Literature.

Thorns for the Rose.

From Fern Leaves from Fanny's Portfolio.

"It will be very ridiculous in you Rose, to refuse to give up that child," said a dark looking man to the pretty widow Grey.—"Think what a relief it will be to have one of your children taken off your hands. It costs something to live now-a-days,"—and Uncle Ralph scowled portentously, and he pushed his purse farther down in his coat-pocket,—"and you know you have another mouth to feed. They'll educate her, clothe and feed her, and——"

"Yes," said the impetuous, and warm-hearted mother, rising quickly from her chair and setting her little feet down in a very determined manner upon the floor, while a bright flush passed over her cheek, "yes, Ralph, and teach her to forget and disrespect her mother!"

"Pshaw, Rose, how absurd! She'll outgrow all that when she gets to be a woman, even if they succeed now. Would you stand in your own child's light? She will be an heiress, if you act like a sensible woman; and, if you persist in refusing, you may live to see the day when she will reproach you for it."

This last argument carried some weight with it; and Mrs. Seldon sat down dejectedly and folded her little hands in her lap.—She had not thought of that. She might be taken away, and little Kathaleen forced to toil for daily bread.

Uncle Ralph saw the advantage he had gained, and determined to pursue it—for he had a great horror of being obliged eventually to provide for them himself.

"Come, Rose, don't sit there looking so solemn; put it down, now in black and white, and send off for the letter, before one of your soft womanish fits comes on again," and he pushed a sheet of paper toward her, with pen and ink.

Just then the door burst open, and little Kathaleen came bounding in from her play, bright with the loveliness of youth and health, and springing into her mother's lap, and clasping her neck, frowned from beneath her curls at Uncle Ralph, whom she suspected somehow or other to be connected with the tear drop that was trembling on her mother's long eye-lashes.

"I can't do it, Ralph," said the young widow, clasping her child to her breast, and raining tears and smiles enough upon her to make a mental rainbow.

"You are a fool!" said the vexed man, "and you'll live to hear somebody tell you so, I'm thinking;" and he slammed the door in a very suggestive manner, as he passed out.

Poor Mrs. Seldon! Stunned by the sudden death of a husband who was all to her that her warm heart craved, she clung the more closely to his children. No woman ever knew better than Rose Seldon the undying love of a mother. The offer that had been made her for Kathaleen was from distant relations of her husband—of whom she knew little, except that Mr. and Mrs. Clair were childless, and had found a great deal of fault with her husband's choice of a wife. They had once made her a short visit, and somehow or other, all the time they were there—and it seemed a little eternity to her for that very reason—she never dared creep to her husband's side, or slide her little hand in his, or pass it caressingly over his broad white forehead, or run into the hall for a parting kiss, or do anything, in short, save to sit up straight, two leagues off, and be proper!

Now you may be sure this was all very excruciating to little Mrs. Rose, who was verdant enough to think that husbands were intended to love, and who owned a little heart quite as large as a little woman could conveniently carry about. She saw nothing on earth so beautiful as those great dark eyes of his—especially when they were bent on her—nor heard any music to compare with that deep, rich voice; and though she had been married many happy years, her heart leaped at the sound of his footstep as it did the first day he called her 'wife.'

Cared she "Great Reaper" for that?—Stayed he for the clasped hands of entreaty, or the scalding tear of agony? Reckoned he that not one silver thread mingled in the dark locks of the strong man? No! by the desolation of that widowed heart, no! he laid his icy fingers on those lips of love, and chilled that warm brave heart, and then turned coldly away to seek another victim. And Rose pressed his children to her heart with a deeper love—a love born of sorrow—and said we will not part. She knew that fingers that never toiled before, must toil unceasingly now. She knew when her heart was sad, there was no broad breast to lean upon.—She had already seen days that seemed to have no end, dragging their slow, weary length along. She dare not go to a drawer, trunk or escritoire, lest some memento of him should meet her eye. She struggled bravely through the day to keep back the tears, for her children's sake; but night came, when those little restless limbs needed a respite—even from play—when the little prattling voices were hushed, and the bright eye pris ned beneath its snowy lid; then, indeed, the long pent-up grief held in check through the day by a mother's unselfish love, burst forth; till exhausted with tearful vigils, she would creep at the grey dawn, between the rosy little sleepers, and resting close to their blooming faces, dream—God knows how mockingly—of happy hours that would never come again.

And O! the slow torture of each morning waking; the indistinct recollection of something dreadful; the hand drawn slowly across the aching brow: the struggle to remember! Then—the opening eye, the unfamiliar objects, the strange, new, small room nothing home-like but those sleeping orphans.

God help the widow!

And now, as if her cup of bitterness were not full, little Kathaleen must leave her.—Must it be? She paced the room that night after Uncle Ralph had left her, and thought of his words, "She may live to tell you so." Then she went to the bedside, and parted the clustering hair from Kathaleen's forehead, and marked with a mother's pride the sweet, careless grace of those dimpled limbs, and noted each shining curl. There was the father's long lashes, his brow, his straight classic profile. O, what would he tell her? And then, old memories came back with a rushing tide that swept all before it! Poor Rose!

Kathaleen stirs uneasily, and calls "Mamma," and smiles in her sleep. O, how could she part with that little loving heart?—Countless were the caresses she received from her every hour. Watchful and sensitive, she noted every shade of sorrow on her mother's face and by a thousand mute remonstrances, testified her unspoken sympathy. That little impulsive heart would be cased in an armour of frigidity at Clairville. She might be sad, or sick, or dying, and Rose shuddered and sat still nearer to her child. What companionship would she have? What moral influence exerted?—Might she not even be weaned from the heart she had laid beneath?

Ah! Uncle Ralph, you little knew, as you sat in your office the next morning, and folded a little slip of paper back in its envelope, upon which was written these simple words, 'Kathaleen shall go,'—you little knew at what cost! You marked not the blistered paper and the unsteady penmarks as you smiled satisfactorily, and said, 'very concise and sensible, for a woman."

Uncle Ralph did think of it again once, as he walked home to his dinner; but it was only to congratulate himself that if Rose should be unable to support herself—which he doubted—there would be one less for him to look after! As to a woman's tears—pshaw! they were always crying for something; if it wasn't for that, it would be something else.

We will pass over the distressful parting between mother and child. The little trunk was only packed; the little Bible down in one corner. A book-mark, with a lamb embroidered upon it, was slipped in at these words—"Suffer little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." Mother's God would care for Kathaleen; there was sweet comfort in that

And so Rose choked back her tears, and unclasped again and again the little clinging arms from her neck, and bade her sunny-haired child "good-bye!" and laughed hysterically, as the little hand waved another, and a last adieu. Even Uncle Ralph felt an uncomfortable sensation about his fifth button, and gave his dickey a nervous twitch and looked very steadily at the tops of the opposite houses!

* * * * * *

Two months had passed! Little Kathaleen sat very quiet in that heated close school-room. There was a dark shadow under her eyes, either from illness or sorrow, and her face was very pale. Rose had written to her, but the letters were in the grave of Mrs. Clair's pockets, never to be resurrectionized; so Kathaleen was none the wiser or happier. Uncle Ralph made it a principle never to think of any thing that impaired his digestion; so he dismissed all uneasy thoughts of, or care for his niece, and made no inquiries; because he was firmly of the opinion, that "Where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise."

"You are uncommonly obtuse about your lesson this morning," said Kathaleen's tutor; "you've told me twice that France was bounded south by the Gulf of Mexico. What are you thinking about?" said he, as he grasped her arm.

"Sir?" said little Kathleen, abstractedly.

"I say, what ails you, to be so stupid this morning," said the vexed pedagogue.

"My head aches badly," said Kathaleen; "and—and—"

"And what?" said Mr. Smith

"And—I—want—to—see—my—mother!" said the child, with a burst of tears.

"Fiddlestick!" said the amiable Mr Smith, "if she cared much about you, I reckon she would have written to you before now. Mrs. Clair thinks she's married again, or something of that sort; so don't worry your head for nonsense. How's France bounded, hey?

The division lines on the atlas were quite concealed by Kathaleen's tears; so she was ordered into the presence of her grim relative who coaxed and threatened in vain, and finally sent her to bed.

For two long, weary months the free, glad spirit of the child had been fettered and cramped at Clairville. No one spoke to her of home or her mother; or, if they chanced to mention the latter, it was always in a slurring, sneering manner, more painful to the loving, sensitive child than their silence.—But why did mamma not write? that was the only wearing thought by day and night. And so Kathaleen drooped, and lost colour and spirits, and walked like an automaton, up and down the stiff garden walks, and "sat up straight," and "turned out her toes," as she was bid; and had a quick, frightened, nervous manner as if she were constantly in fear of reproof or punishment.

"Bridget," said Mrs. Clair, "how is Kathaleen? has she got over her hysterics? I must break her of that."

"Dear heart, no ma'am! She's just fretting the soul out of her for a sight of her mother, its nater, I spose," said Bridget polishing her face with her checked apron.

"Stuff, Bridget! The child's just like her mother; and that's saying enough.—However, give her a little valerian, and sleep at the side of her bed to-night. I'll look in in the morning, said the angular lady, as she smoothed out her dress and her wrinkles.

And so Bridget, obedient to orders, stretched her stout Irish limbs, 'at the side of the bed,' though she might as well been in Ireland as there, for any response she made to that plaintive petition, through the long night, "Oh, do call my mamma! please call my mamma!"

And so night passed! and the golden morning light streamed in upon the waxen face of little Kathaleen. No breath came from those parted lips; no ringlet stirred with life; the hands lay meekly beside her, and the last tear she should ever shed lay glittering like a gem upon her cheek.

"Ralph," said Mrs. Selden, "I shall start for Clairville to-morrow; I can stay away from Kathaleen no longer."

"You'll be mad if you do," said Uncle Ralph, the child's well enough, or you would hear; you can't expect them to be writing all the time. Your welcome will be a sorry one, I can tell you; so take my advice, and let well alone."

Mrs. Selden made no reply, but began to pack her trunk, and Uncle Ralph left the house.

In about an hour's time he returned, and found Rose trying, in vain to clasp the lid of her trunk

"Do come here, Ralph," said she without looking up, "and settle this refractory lock. Dear little Kathaleen! I've crammed so many traps in here for her—How glad she will be to see me!" and she turned and looked up to see why Ralph did not answer.

Blow, cheek and lip were in an instant blanched to paleness. A mother's quick eye had spared his tongue the sad tidings.

* * * * * *

If you visit the Lunatic Asylum at——, you will see a very beautiful woman, her glossy ringlets slightly threaded with silver. Day after day she paces up and down that long corridor, and says in heart-rending tones to every one she meets, "O, do call mamma! won't you please call my mamma?"

SCENE IN A CAR.

The seats of the car were all occupied—crowded. None of our avenue cars ever yet were full, so, of course, the house on wheels stopped for me.

Not wishing to disturb those who were seated, I was intending to stand, but a gentleman up at the far end arose and insisted upon my taking his seat. Being very tired, I thanked him and obeyed.

Presently, a lady, much younger, much prettier, and much better than myself entered the car. No less than four gentlemen arose instantly, offering her a seat. She smiled sweetly and unaffectedly, and thanking the gentleman who urged the nearest seat to her, she seated herself with a peculiar grace of manner.

She had one of those faces Raphael was always painting,—touchingly sweet and expressive.

A little after this young beauty had taken her seat, a poor woman, looking very thin and very pale, with that care-worn, haggard look, that poverty, and sorrow, and hard labor always gives, came in. She might have been one of those poor seamstresses who work like slaves and—starve for their labor. She was shabby and meanly clad, and seemed weak and exhausted. She had evidently no sixpences to throw away, and came in the car, not to stand, but to rest, while she was helped on in her journey.

While she was meekly standing for the moment, none of the gentlemen (?) offering to rise, Raphael's angel, with sweet, reproving eyes, looked on those who had so officiously offered her a seat, and seeing none of them attempt to move, and just as myself was rising to give the poor old lady a seat, she arose and insisted upon the woman taking her seat.

It was all the work of but a moment; and the look of grateful surprise the old woman gave her, and the glance of sweet pity the beautiful girl bestowed on the woman as she yielded her seat, and the evident consternation of the broadcloth individuals, who were manifestly put to shame, all were to me irresistably interesting and instructive.

One of these same broadcloth wearers, apparently overpowered with confusion, got up and left the car, and Raphael's angel took his vacant seat.—N. Y. Day Book.

A FAST OF THE LORD'S CHOICE.

A Sermon: Preached in the Evangelical Union Church, of Picton, N. S., on the Occasion of a Public Fast, for the Success of the British Arms, in the Impending War Against Russia.

BY REV. ALEX. MCARTHUR.

"Behold ye fast for strife and debate, and smite with the fist of wickedness, &c.—Isaiah, lviii. 4.

His Excellency, the Lieutenant Governor, has appointed this day, to be set apart for humiliation and prayer; that, "In the impending war between Great Britain and Russia, her Majesty's fleets and forces may be preserved from danger, and crowned with success." In compliance with this requisition, we are assembled, to take such part in this public fast, as our consciences will permit. I have selected Isaiah, 58th chap., as a foundation for remarks, on the present occasion; but more particularly, the following passage:—"Behold, ye fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness: ye shall not fast as ye do this day, to make your voice to be heard on high. Is it such a fast that I have chosen? a day for a man to afflict his soul? is it to bow down his head as a bulrush, and to spread sackcloth and ashes under him? wilt thou call this a fast, and an acceptable day to the Lord? Is not this the fast that I have chosen? to loose the bands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry, and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? When thou seest the naked, that thou cover him; and that thou hide not thyself from thine own flesh?"—Isaiah: 4, 5, 6, 7.

It is not my purpose to enter into an exposition of the chapter before us; but simply, to make it the basis for a few observations, respecting the design, propriety, use, form, and spirit of a national fast. Preliminary to such observations, I beg to call your attention to certain principles observed in God's dealing with nations.

1st. Each nation is recognized as having a distinct individual character—as, being a unit, and acting as a body corporate, in its individual capacity, through the heads of its various departments. A nation in the eyes of the Lord, is as one body.

2dly. Nations are held amenable for their national acts; that is for acts performed under official authority, by heads or agents of government.

6thly. In the infliction of retribution upon nations, it so happens that the righteous suffer with the wicked. They are so mixed up in social and civil compact, that it is impossible, in the nature of the case, to distinguish between them, in the affliction of punishment. For instance, if a nation should fail to use sanitory regulations, necessary to prevent the spread of pestilence; when it reaches our shores, it makes indiscriminate slaughter among the people. The pure and virtuous fall under its fell power, as well as the most reckless violator of organic and moral law. If a nation continue the practice of slavery, all parties are made to feel the demoralizing influence of such a perverted social condition—those protesting, as well as those giving it their individual or governmental support. When a government lends its influence and patronage to such a demoralizing traffic as the sale of intoxicating drinks, for beverage purposes, the entire people become victims, more or less, to the evils arising from such traffic—those giving vote and voice against it, as well as those directly connected with it, either by sale or use. Public wrongs are private injuries. We come now to consider.

II.—THE DESIGN, PROPRIETY, USE, FORM, AND SPIRIT OF A NATIONAL FAST.

1st.—Negatively. It is not the design of a national fast, to substitute religious observances for repentance, or to make amends for doing wrong. We must not suppose, because we quit working with our hands, give up eating our daily bread, assemble ourselves as we now do, to sing psalms, offer prayers, etc., that God will accept this outward service, instead of undoing the wrong we have done; or justify the wrong we intend to do. Our worship must be sincere, and our repentance evinced by actual reformation, or we turn the whole fast into a grand exhibition of national hypocrisy. This would be covering our sin under the garb of sanctity, or asking leave to practice it under the sanction of religion.

Is this such a fast as the Lord commands? Let us not add to our numerous national sins, the guilt of national hypocrisy.

It is very evident from the severe rebuke of the Lord's prophet, that the Jews had the idea in their minds that, if they observed certain outward rites that the Lord would overlook their sins, and grant them indulgence in their continued violations of the law of love; hence he tells them in the 5th, 6th, and 7th verses of this chapter, the kind of fast God hath chosen. A fast accompanied and followed by deeds of benevolence—works meet for repentance.

We exclaim against popish indulgences, and we do well; but let us beware lest we commit the same folly in another form. The papist gives his money for indulgences; will we seek to buy them more cheaply, by the simple observance of outward forms! The Jews in the days of Isaiah, thought they could do this. They imposed upon themselves by an attempt to impose upon the Almighty. Hence, the complaint in the 3d verse. "Wherefore have we fasted, say they, and thou seest not? Wherefore have we afflicted our souls, and thou takest no knowledge?" The prophet gives them plainly to understand, it was because they had substituted penance for actual repentance and deeds of humanity. What are outward forms to the Lord, unless they spring from love? Empty as sounding brass.

2nd. The design of a national fast is, to afford occasion for the public recognition of our national responsibility. It is very useful in this respect.

3rd. A national fast furnishes a public opportunity for a public confession of national guilt.

4th. It gives an opportunity for publicly renouncing our national sins. National sins have been publicly committed, and they ought to be as publicly confessed and renounced. They were not done in a corner, but committed before God, and the universe; as openly should they be acknowledged, and abandoned. If we had committed them privately, and if they resulted in private injury only, they might be privately confessed and given up; but as they are known of all men, and expose us to a common retribution, before men ought they to be confessed and forsaken.

5th. A national fast is a public recognition of the existence and government of God, by a nation, in their national capacity; and therefore, a governmental fast is proper and useful. If a nation commit sins as a nation, it is certainly very proper that, as a nation, they should in this way acknowledge the existence of a God against whom they have sinned, and his righteous government, of which theirs should be a type.

6th. A national fast tends to rouse the consciences of the people to a sense of their national depravity.

7th. It affords an excellent opportunity for the minister of the Gospel to expose and rebuke national sins. Such then is the design, propriety, and use of national fasts.

III.—IN WHAT FORM AND SPIRIT OUGHT A NATIONAL FAST TO BE OBSERVED.

Our text is very explicit on this point. Read it. It is too long to requote. Some there are, who object to forms; but, it must appear obvious, if we would give expression to spirit, it must be by a form. It was not the sin of the Jews that they had a form of fasting, but that they had the form without the spirit. When the spirit was absent, the very form, however solemnly observed, became an abomination to the Lord. "To this man will I look who is poor and of a contrite spirit." But he who is not thus sincere and contrite, in the observance of religious services, is thus regarded. "He that killeth an ox, is as if he slew a man; he that sacrificeth a lamb, as he that cut off a dog's neck; he that offereth an oblation, as if he offered swine's blood; he that offereth incense, as if he blessed an idol."—Isaiah, lxvi. 2, 3. The offering of sacrifices, oblations, and incense, was not only lawful, but positively commanded; but even these enjoined ceremonies and sacrifices, if not observed in the spirit of true repentance, became as offensive as murder, abominations, and idolatory, in the sight of God; so also, of fasts observed without the spirit of humanity. If we have the proper spirit of fasting, that is no reason why we should not have the form, but rather a reason why we should.

Again, the observance of the form will serve to deepen the spirit of penitence, humiliation, and benevolence. Abstinence from food serves to quicken our interior perceptions, and leads us to the discovery of sin, while waiting devoutly before God in the ordinances of religion; and may originate such excess of sorrow for sin so as to render fasting necessary. This is doubtless the philosophy of fasting. Children in prospect of a journey can eat no food. Mental excitement of any kind takes away the appetite. This is to be accounted for on philosophical principles; the rush of blood to the brain deprives the digestive organs of their wonted activity.

Alas! if we had a proper view of our national sins we would be so bound down with grief and sorrow as to go without food for many days.

Again it is proper, as before said, that the head and agents of the Government should, in their official capacity, meet at some particular point, with the people as far as practicable, as the Jews were wont to assemble at Jerusalem, and there in simplicity and godly sincerity humble themselves and put away their sins by looking unto the Lord. But if not at some particular place, we should meet as we do this day, in our several places of worship for this purpose.

But it may be objected on the ground of some of the principles laid down at the commencement of our discourse: why should the people assemble for this purpose if the heads of government are to be held responsible for national offences. I reply, under a popular Government such as ours, where universal suffrage is enjoyed, the people share in this responsibility. Our responsibility is as to the extent of our political privileges. Whatever may be said of other nations enjoying less civil liberty, it is true of us that we share the responsibility of national acts in common with our rulers; for, it is by our suffrage our legislators hold their offices; and does not God hold us responsible for the kind of men we send to represent us in Parliament and make our laws? Yes, it is proper that the people—the whole people—should meet to confess the sins of our rulers, and our own sins, so far as we may have lent our countenance and influence to governmental wrongs. The lawgivers are our servants, expressing our will in statute enactments, which if wrong, it must be by our permission; for such permission are we held responsible.

We are therefore met this day to confess our national sins. That we may do so intelligently, it is of the first importance that these sins be specified. This is a painful part of our duty, but it must not be omitted.

IV.—NOTICE SOME OF THE PARTICULAR SINS OF WHICH WE ARE GUILTY, AS A NATION.

1st. In our treatment of the native tribes of conquered territory What has been our treatment of the original proprietors of the land in which we live? We have robbed them of their wide domain; wasted their hunting grounds; destroyed their means of living, and quenched their council fires. And what return have we made them? Have we left them a remnant of land as a suitable reservation upon which to pitch their camp? What have we done towards their education and moral culture? Has their relation to our civilization tended to elevate them?

Alas, poor Indian! his spirit is broken. That native dignity which he is said to have possessed when he roamed in the largest liberty, in undisputed possession of his unbroken forests, where is it? We have communicated to him our diseases; given him our vices without our virtues; devoured him with our fire-waters; and—"unkindest cut of all"—by a recent Act of Parliament doomed him to a political death. We have excluded him from the enjoyment of those privileges which we cordially extend to people of other countries, who may domiciate themselves in our midst. Even the poor negro—a fugitive from southern slavery—in all his ignorance, and degradation—is made welcome to the enjoyment of all the rights and immunities of a British subject, on complying with those conditions enjoined upon all other aliens and foreigners. But—oh! shame, where is thy blush! The Indian—the true native of the soil—because he is an Indian, however intelligent, wealthy or wise, he may become,—and only the Indian, is denied the right of suffrage.

It ought to be our proud boast that there is at least one spot on the North American continent, where, under the mane of the British lion, the fugitive slave can find, not only protection from the beak and talons of the American eagle, but also a share in the right of universal suffrage. But tell it not in Gath! it would form a blank in Nova Scotia, and what adds to the proof of our insensibility respecting the red man's rights is the fact that not a single voice has moved, nor a pen been stirred, to call into the outrage that has been perpetrated upon him. We have no ground to boast any but cause for humiliation. Think not that they are insensible to our treatment of them. They feel it deeply. A lady of our acquaintance said to an intelligent Indian, the other day, "Peter, I suppose you have heard there is war with Russia: will you fight if they should come here." Peter stood for a moment, then replied,—"What me have to fight for?"—and his eyes flashed with indignation as he spoke—"Me have nothing. White people take away everything from Indian. No land—no nothing. When me put up camp—white people pull 'um down!—tell me go away—no business here. Me make buckets, basket, broom to sell: white people always beat me down: want me to give them for most nothing. Me fight! no, no, me have nothing to fight for. Oh! me wish me could speak English; me tell people great deal. Me think some white people very good; but not many care for Indian."

Poor Indian! What can we reply to thy speech? It is as though thou hadst used the words of the prophet in our text, in their application to us this day, in relation to our treatment of thee.

With such manifestations of our selfishness before their eyes, are we in a position to tell this abused people the love of Christ, or teach them the humanity of his religion, if we would do them good religiously, we must be careful that we do not alienate them from us.

2nd. We have reason to humble ourselves in view of the attitude which our rulers have assumed in relation to the traffic in intoxicating drinks.

They have refused to pass a law suppressing this terribly ruinous traffic. Laws are continued on the statute books of the Province, giving it our countenance and support. So far as it can be made honorable by being made lawful, we have made this destructive traffic honorable.

Lawgivers are presumed to legislate for the public good. They have said, therefore, that the making and vending of intoxicating drinks, for beverage purposes, is good and not evil. They have taken action, or rather refused to take action, on this subject, in view of all the light respecting the disastrous effects of the traffic upon the civil, educational, physical, moral and religious interests of the country. In view also of the benefits conferred upon neighboring commonwealths by the exercise of wholesome laws prohibiting the sale of intoxicating drinks. They have given their consent, that a system be continued in our midst, which eventuates in the commission of every crime named or condemned by our laws—which leads to the violation of every command of the decalogue, and which raises insuperable obstacles to the salvation of many of our young men. No drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God.

3dly. We are guilty of many Wars. Whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence even of your own lusts? Spring they not from human depravity? Alas! how the blood of our fellow men stains the pages of our history! Now we are once more engaged in war. for what purpose? To keep the so-called Robber of the North from accomplishing his design of conquest and acquisition of territory? We have taken slice after slice of the lands of native tribes at an immense sacrifice of human life. We have appropriated large tracts of the continents of the earth, and many islands of the sea; indeed, so extensive are our conquests, that it has become our boast that the sun never sets upon the dominions of Her Majesty the Queen. Have we not watered these conquered lands with blood? South Caffraria is red with the blood of her sons—recently shed. The swords of our warriors are yet dripping with the blood of the Burmese whom we lately slaughtered by hundreds because a few pounds—not two thousand—were owing to a few British merchants. We have been embroiling ourselves with the quarrels of other nations from time immemorial, it is said from a love of justice. Ah! would that we did love justice much, and mercy more. Did we love justice much when we lent our power to support the tottering thrones of European despotism against the cause of popular rights? Where was our love of justice when Poland fell? When Hungary was drowned in her own blood? When liberty was driven from Italy at the point of French bayonets? Where now is our love of justice in seeking to obtain an alliance with Austria, at the expense of arresting the uprising of fallen countries, and the progress of popular freedom on the continent of Europe? But we are engaged in war again under the plea of justice! and are called together by executive authority to ask God's blessing upon the British arms!

V.—WHAT THEN IS OUR DUTY AS CHRISTIANS, IN VIEW OF THE PRESENT WAR?

1*st.* To lament its existence—to mourn over the fact of human depravity, from whence comes war—to lament the folly of the nations in attempting to settle their disputes by the sword, rather than by peaceful arbitration, or through the intervention of international law.

2*ndly.* To pray God speedily to interpose, and by his providence arrest its further progress: But

3*rdly.* As we are the servants of Him who said, My kingdom is not of this world else would my servants fight—who command us to love our neighbor as we do ourselves—nay, who commands us to love our enemies, and pray for those who despitefully use us and persecute us—and who has pronounced a blessing upon the peacemakers; we beg to be excused from approaching the mercy seat, in the name of this same Jesus, who is the Prince of Peace, to ask the God of Love to prosper our efforts, in pouring tempests of musket and cannon balls and grape shot, into the bosoms of the Russians, or in raining bomb shells upon their towns and cities, thus ushering thousands unprepared into eternity, and causing the hearts of surviving friends to ache with grief. We must be loyal to Jesus, "not fearing the wrath of the king." We must not "fast for strife and debate, and to smite with the fist of wickedness." Let us keep the fast the Lord has chosen. "And if thou draw out thy soul to the hungry, and satisfy the afflicted soul, then shall thy light shine forth in obscurity, and thy darkness be as the noon day."—ver. 10.

REMARKS.

1*st.* Let it not be said that the minister of the Gospel has nothing to do with national sins. If not, why are we called together by executive authority to consider them, mourn over them, and repent in view of them? Is not this subject perfectly legitimate? Is it not in happy keeping with the day and the occasion? What is the Lord's command to his ministers? "Cry aloud, and spare not, lift up thy voice like a trumpet, show my people their transgressions, and the house of Jacob their sins; v. 10. "My people," and "the house of Jacob," may represent both the Church and State. When public sins are committed, it becomes the ministers duty to rebuke them, in the manner here commanded, as he must answer before the bar of God.

2*d.* We learn from this subject the genius of our holy religion. Isaiah has been truly tyled the evangelical prophet. This chapter breathes the very spirit of the Gospel. The Christian's duty is to heal wounds, not to open them; to assuage the anguish of the heart, not to extort the wail of widows and orphans. Is there anything in what Jesus Christ ever did, or said, or enjoined, to found an appeal before the mercy seat, for the success of war, by whomsoever, or for whatsoever purpose waged! Does it shine forth from his sermon on the Mount? Is it demonstrated by the parable of the good Samaritan? Does it lie patent upon the record of his acts? Is it breathed from his prayer on the cross?

It is granted that there are bold expressions to be found in the Old Testament, couched in the strained language of Oriental poetry, which seem to ascribe warlike attributes to the God of the Hebrews; but would it be a safe mode of reasoning to infer from such expressions, that the God of the universe, whom Christians adore, is the patron deity of warriors? Because that in a dark traditionary age—an age giving birth to warlike deeds, and warlike poetry—such expressions are used, which represent God as taking delight in war, does it follow, that we, who live in this enlightened age, with the ever-green humanitarian example of Jesus Christ before us, and his love requiring precept in our hands, should consider ourselves called upon to sanction the inhuman practice of war, by the ordinances of religion? It may be Cromwellian so to do, but it is not Christian.

There is enough of the war principle in human nature developing itself gratuitously. It needs not the inspiration of psalms, or the invocation of prayers, to warm it into life. As it springs from lust, it ought to be repressed rather than excited; certainly it ought not to be sanctified by praise and prayer.

3*rd.* Let war go forth on its own merits. Let it not be protected in the name of religion. Withhold from it Church influence and woman's smile, let not music be consecrated to its use,—strip it of its plumes, tinsel, and gaudy trappings,—take away the false glory which surrounds it—let it fall into merited disgrace under the frown of Christianity, and how long would it be before the hand of industry, seizing war's instruments of death, would fulfil the Scriptures, by beating spears into pruning-hooks and swords into plow-shares? AMEN.

Lucy Stone.

Partly in Warren and partly in West Brookfield, Mass., lies a grand old hill, which was pointed out to us as we passed over the Western Railroad, Massachusetts, and half way up its Eastern slope, whose elevation costs a good hour's walk among big rocks that most resemble little barns, lies the farmhouse of Francis Stone—a jolly well-to-do old farmer of Puritan New England stamp who made Coy's Hill his home in early manhood, and with a wife congenial in spirit, there brought up a family of seven children, four of them still on earth—of whom one Luey, the world-known Lucy Stone is a younger member. With the kitchen work for months, and an occasional out-door life, when the hay or grain might get a wetting, with picking chestnuts in the woods and apples in the orchard, with driving cows and milking, playing hull-gull, and telling stories at the winter fireside, and a thousand little toils and pleasures, of life, with brothers and sisters at home, and six months yearly at the district school, where lessons were dispatched by a single reading lesson and the remainder of the day left for play, Lucy passed her earliest days.

Passing intermediate events—her struggle with Dame Fortune, who denied her a prize, while she gave her an ardent thirst for knowledge, and the happiest and rarest method of communicating it—we will find her next- standing, first, in one of the best classes of Oberlin College, where she helped herself by teaching, and no one could satisfy her classes so well as Lucy—honored and loved, and respected by students and Professors. The sequel up to the present our readers know already, for since leaving Oberlin some six years ago, her life has been in public.

Taking a first position in the work of general reform, teaching by example and precept, a woman of most attractive manner both on and off the platform, with persevering industry that merits high reward, she has won for herself a position in the public estimation beyond the fear of criticism. "I never met Lucy when she had not something interesting to say;" the Editorial reporters say, "Lucy's speeches shall always find a place in our columns;" and the best critic out, "I have never anywhere, heard a speaker whose style of eloquence I more admired;" the pride of her acquaintances, the idol of the crowd, wherever she goes, the people en masse turn out to hear Lucy Stone, and are never weary of her stirring eloquence.

A Story of Circumstantial Evidence.

Some years ago I went especially to Clonmell Assizes, and accidentally witnessed a trial which I shall never forget. A wretched man, a native of that county, was charged with the murder of his neighbour. It seemed that an ancient feud existed between them. They had met at a fair and exchanged blows; again that evening they met at a low pot-house, and the bodily interference of friends alone prevented a fight between them. The prisoner was heard to vow vengeance against his rival. The wretched victim left the house, followed soon afterwards by the prisoner, and was found the next day by the roadside, murdered, and his face so barbarously beaten in by a stone that he could only be identified by his dress. The facts were strong against the prisoner; in fact, it was the strongest case of circumstantial evidence I had ever met with. As a form—of his guilt there was no doubt—the prisoner was called for his defence. He called, to the surprise of every one, the murdered man. The murdered man came forward. It seemed that another man had been murdered—the identification by dress was vague, for all the peasantry of Tipperary wear the same description of clothes—that the presumed victim had got a hint that he would be arrested under the White Boy Act—had fled, and only returned with a noble Irish feeling of justice, when he found that his ancient foe was in jeopardy on his account. The case was clear; the prisoner was innocent. The Judge told the Jury it was unnecessary to charge them. They requested permission to retire; they returned in about two hours, when the foreman, with a long face, handed him the verdict of "Guilty." Every one was astonished.—"Good God," said the Judge, "of what is he guilty? Not of murder, surely." "No, my lord," said the foremen, "but if he did not murder that man, he stole my mare three years ago."—Daniel O'Connell.

Mr. Ward is expected to return certainly by the 1st of September, if not before. He is now labouring as Agent for the Colonial Missionary Society till the 26th of June, having resigned his agency for the Canadian Anti-Slavery Society. He raised in England and Scotland for the latter £1200 sterling, or £1500 currency, or $6000.

The Provincial Exhibition to be held in London, C. W., in September next.

The London (C. W.) papers continue to stir up the pure minds of the public, on the subject of the "Provincial Exhibition," to be held in their Town, the coming autumn; and we "take our pen in hand," at this time, to write a word on the same, and matter relating thereto, for the perusal of those of our readers who may not see the western periodicals to which we refer.

We give the following abstract from the List of Prizes to be awarded in the Agricultural and other departments, and may continue the list in future:—

To our farmer readers, the Exhibition should be a gathering of especial interest. Farming is a noble occupation, and as its dignity is materially enhanced by the competition created among those engaged in it, as well as the relation created between it and the trades, by means of organized exhibitions, we desire to see it become the "calling" among the coloured men of this Province. Do not mistake what we say, good readers, and make the interpretation read, "the only calling"—not at all; but as we live in a country pre-eminently suited to agriculture, let the majority become agriculturists.

The prizes to be awarded on the coming occasion, speak volumes for the enterprise and prosperity of Canadians, and why may not our farmers be on hand with their wheat, butter, cloth, fleece, &c.? Remember it is to be the best article of a certain kind that will get the award, not the most fashionable hue of the owner of it, as it is in the United States. Immediately connected with the consideration of this "Provincial Exhibition," is land proprietorship. If men will not interest themselves to secure a right in the land, they will not have products to exhibit. It is a sorry figure, this taking another man's produce to market, or to fair or exhibition for ever. Circumstances too well known, operate continually to prevent coloured men of the United States, generally, and in many of the States, free but poor white men, from ownership in the soil sufficiently extensive to be advantageous; but it is not the case here. We are at a loss to explain the evident indifference of both white and coloured Canadians, and others in this respect. Many have bought and do buy, it is true—more in proportion to numbers, of the first named, than do their brethren in the States; but do we make the efforts we should to get an interest in the soil? Prices are fast changing to a higher scale, as well of lands, as of provision, and hundreds look quietly on as it goes beyond their reach, probably for the satisfaction of saying twenty years hence, what many now say of lands twenty years ago: "We might have owned all this; but—now, an acre is worth a moderate fortune." It is quite time that coloured British subjects understood that ownership in the soil, ensures a responsibility—of equal importance, to them, with that of their fellow-subjects, and that Provincial exhibitions will, for them, be established in vain, unless they first get possession of the soil. We will say more on this subject next week.

The Anti-Slavery Festival.

The attention of the public is respectfully solicited to the advertisement of the Anti-Slavery Festival in another column, for the support of the Provincial Freeman, which will take place in the St. Lawrence Hall on Thursday evening next, the 29th inst. No pains will be spared to make the Festival agreeable to those who may favor it with their presence. Revds. Dr. Burns, W. Ormiston, E. M. Harper, F. Grissin, W. P. Newman, J. B. Smith, and others, will deliver addresses on the occasion.

A Missionary among the Fugitive Slaves.

Miss Abigail Martin, a member of the 1st Congregational Society in Rochester, is soon to leave for Canada West as Missionary among the Fugitive Slave Population, under the auspices of the American Missionary Association.

Is Miss Martin white, we are curious to know? If so, she will doubtless fare well at the hands of the American Missionary Association. Should she be so unfortunate as to have a different complexion, and at the same time claim a rational share of independence of thought, while acting under their patronage, we would not answer for her permanent support by them. Some of the A. M. A. deals summarily with "its colored help" when unwilling to be mere machines, as we have known to our cost—and woe-betide Miss Martin should she not run when sent on other errands also, than those connected with her mission, or should she claim a right to an opinion on matters of general interest. The "Fugitive Slaves in Canada" afford a good hobby for the unscrupulous managers of societies in the United States. May God forgive them for their hypocrisy in this particular! And may He avert the harm they are doing from their victims, the colored people of the country. Many colored people here feel that in a measure they but change masters—the change is from physical shackles to those of a moral and religious character. We would like to say what we know about Missionary operations in the west, under the auspices of the A. M. A., but must defer it till a period in the future, when the trials of Missionaries and colored people—master and man, must become known, as a simple act of justice to a people who have immeasurably out-grown nine out of ten of the persons pensioned among them, who are a burden to the people, and who we verily believe would not be sent by their patron societies to any other field from fear of a sense of their want of qualification. We are favorable to Missions—love to think of the great good Judd, Judson, and other Missionaries do and have done in the east, and what some good Missionaries of the British Societies are now doing among the people here, but deliver us and our people from Yankee Missionaries, such as we have met in Canada, with smooth words and hearts full of negro-hate. May the race die out speedily!

THE CANADA ANTI-SLAVERY SOCIETY.

The Canada Anti-Slavery Society held its Anniversary on Wednesday Evening, the 21st. Frederick Douglass, of Rochester, was present, and made a speech on the occasion; and also on the following evening.

The Annual Report having been destroyed by the late fire, the Secretary, Mr. Henning, made a verbal statement, which consisted, mainly, of the operations of Mr. Ward in England, when acting as their Agent.—Resolutions were passed, which we will lay before our readers next week. Apart from the interest felt in the occasion, as the Society's annual gathering, the meetings are generally admitted to have been spiritless to an extent which the presence of quite a large number of persons at the first one could not obviate. Public expectation had been wrought up to the highest pitch, by published statements, which unfortunately the oratorical effort of Mr. Douglass, the invited guest of the occasion, did not meet. His speech of Thursday evening, was considered rather more in keeping with his oratorical reputation; but altogether his speeches are not thought to be equal to similar trials of skill made on the occasion of a former visit even. Great genius, as well as "gift of gab," is required to enable a speaker to suit his remarks to the people of different countries, though speaking the same language; and in no way will its presence be more easily detected, than by the resources orators or public speakers who live in the United States, display, when called upon to address a Canadian or British audience, where the presence of great genius is wanting to detect by its quick eye, the subjects most suitable to dwell upon, residence and observation are imperatively necessary. These we think Mr. Douglass would require before he could become a great favourite of Torontonians. Quite a large number of gentlemen occupied the platform; among whom were Revds. Wm. R. King of Buxton, Mr. Clark of Quebec, and Mr. J. B. Smith.

Philanthropy at War with Itself.

The Anti-Slavery Associations of Canada appear to be running foul of each other in the exercise of their respective [illegible]. A journal specially devoted to the interests of the colored population was recently established in this city, and was supposed [illegible] by the public generally to hold, as a special part of its duties, the position of [illegible]. In the Anti-Slavery Societies [illegible] the "Ladies Association for the Relief of Colored Fugitives" has practically taken the field [illegible] as opposed to the movements of a Bazaar in aid of a rival newspaper of African sympathies, published in some part of the United States. It can hardly be matter of wonder, that the local journal should feel aggrieved by such a proceeding. The result has been an open rupture between the colored authorities and the magnates of the various Associations. On behalf of the latter, Mr. Thomas Henning makes his appearance in print, but [illegible] from proceedings in a more satisfactory [illegible] of the two [illegible] the Provincial Freeman. It is neither our purpose nor our inclination [illegible] in so interesting a quarrel; but we may probably be allowed to observe, that philanthropy which seems to expend itself in fostering jealousies among those for whose benefit it is ostensibly exerted, might be exchanged for benevolence of a different sort.—Leader.

The above, though "done up" in no very attractive garb, is note-worthy. The writer sees the true state of the "war," as will be seen from the last sentence in which he alludes to the mischief-making tendencies of much of the philanthropy with which we are surrounded. Were it not a heinous sin in the estimation of many of our self-righteous "friends" for us to exercise the privilege justly ours—whether we get it one day or not—to speak the truth without thinking about their approval, we might give facts and figures in abundance to prove the proclivity towards discord of many at the helm; but as we have been sufficiently warned, both in private and public, by colored 'spirits and white,' in the "organization" of the danger of giving offence, and as we have no penchant for writing or talking apologies for doing the right, we shall forbear for the present.

We must say, though reluctantly, that the famous Ægean stables did not present a more loathsome spectacle than do the interior arrangements of some of our modern philanthropy shops.

Defeat of the Ministry.

QUEBEC, June 21st, 1854.

Last night, on motion of Mr Stuart, an address was ordered to His Excellency the Governor General, praying for copies of the reports of the Commissioners appointed to enquire into the origin of the parliament.

On motion of Colonel Prince, a bill to prevent cruelty to dumb animals, was read a first time.

The petition of the Clerks of the House for an increase in salaries was ordered to be printed.

The debate on the address was then begun by Mr. Hartman, who moved an amendment to Mr. Cauchon's amendment, so as to add a censure on the Ministry for not secularizing the Reserves to that of Mr. Cauchon's for not passing the Seigniorial Tenure Bill last year.

Yeas, 16; Nays, 54

Mr Sicotte moved another amendment, to add the Clergy Reserves to that of Mr. Cauchon's, with that gentleman's consent.

After several members had spoken thereon, at half after one this morning, the vote was taken and the amendment carried by a majority of 13 against the Ministry. The division being, Yeas 42; Nays 29; the same vote having been concurred into with regard to Mr. Cauchon's amendment as now framed.

Mr. Hincks moved that the House should adjourn till Thursday next, in order to afford the Ministry time to decide on what course they should adopt under the present circumstances.

The House adjourned accordingly.

The defeat of the Ministry will naturally cause a stir among politicians. As elections for members will take place immediately, and as each party will be on the alert to increase their adherents, we would say to colored voters, weigh well the principles of the candidates you are called upon to support. Without the full enjoyment of your rights, as accorded to you by the laws of the land, questions of a party character will be of little importance. There are men who will be recommended for your political patronage, who, though entertaining similar views with yourselves on the various prominent questions now agitating the public, are yet deadly opposed to you, and who will not hesitate to make use of their official position, should they be elected, to ruin you. Remember those who have petitioned against you! Beware, also, of "wolves in sheep's clothing," who will seek your support from a pretended long service in behalf of your brethren. Such there are, we have been informed, who, after having run the gauntlet through several different professions and callings, will, as a climax, run for parliament this "heat." Do not be duped by false abolitionists, should you succeed in avoiding the toils of open enemies.

Well Employed.

We have been credibly informed that an eminent newspaper man of this city, is industriously giving currency to a statement calculated to injure this paper,—in other words, circulating a report that the Freeman was about to cease; and giving, as authority, a man formerly in our employ, but who was discharged by us because we could do better. He did not leave, as he asserts, "because the paper was about to stop." We were not aware before that men making pretentions to respectability, and of large means, could be found ready to aid such feeble instruments in the work now in full activity, and in the name of the fugitives to crush this paper; but we suppose from occurrences of the present week, we must bear it as one of the compliments now being paid to those who see so clearly that the Freeman "is hurting itself." The quondam foreman who invented the falsehood, is to be pitied, as we doubt, if from his exalted connexions, and other circumstances, he could do less to gain favour.

However, "a word to the wise is sufficient." Our business in this community must not be injured, to gratify the envious.

Tour Through the West.

The proprietors of this paper purpose commencing an extensive series of operations through the West soon, as we have shareholders in the Press at St. Catharines, Hamilton, London, Chatham, Windsor and other places. The General Agent of the Association, has been directed to visit them for the purpose of getting subscribers, assisting in Tea Meetings, and taking donations for the object, and to be otherwise engaged, preparatory to a visit to those parts from the Rev. Mr. Ward, immediately on his return from England.

We hope the female portion of our patrons will be active in their endeavours to put the Canada paper on a sure basis.

Preparations are being made to celebrate the 19th Anniversary of British Emancipation on the first of August, in a manner more imposing than has been done heretofore. A procession, speeches, a dinner, tea-meeting, &c., will make up the observances of the day. We look for a large gathering of the friends from all parts of the country and the States.

The Sermon by Rev. Alex. McArthur, Corresponding Editor of this paper, on the 1st page, will be read with interest. Mr. McA. is a thorough and consistent Peace man.

Negrophobia on Canadian Steamboats.

A few days ago, I left Lewiston, U. S., for Toronto, on the steamer Peerless. I took cabin passage without the least objection being made to negroes sitting amongst white folks. So away we went, swiftly and smoothly, down the great lake. After leaving Niagara, the Company was summoned, as I understood, by the ringing of a bell to dinner, which call was quickly obeyed by nearly every passenger aft, and I, too, having a desire to gratify the inner man, took up the line of march, and soon found myself seated at the table in company with others. In a short time, Mr. Hurly, the steward—a stinted pattern of a man—came along collecting the money, 2s. 6d. for the dinner—when he got to a friend of mine and myself, this would-be good little man, if the devil would let him alone, whispered that he would see us after "a little bit." Of course we were at a loss to tell why we should be thus specially favored. However, we were not allowed to cogitate long respecting it; for this very efficient and indispensable little man of the Peerless came to us for the pay for our dinners, and with a special message, as he informed us, from head quarters; he prefaced his message by telling us that we had violated the rules; that Captain Dick did not allow colored passengers to eat at the first table. After informing him that we would consent to eat at no other, he then told us that Capt. Dick was indomitable. Now you will understand, as I do, by this remark, that Capt. Dick and his steward are both completely under the control of Yankee influences and prejudices, and like the northern white slaves of the States, yield to the worse than barbarous custom of excluding colored persons from what they are pleased to call the first table. I understand that there are other boats running on this lake where the same outrage is perpetrated. I hope that colored people will stop patronizing these second tables; every man who eats at one of them is guilty of consenting to his own degredation.

ELEVATOR.

To the Editor of the Colonist:

SIR—I notice the following in your paper of this morning:

"By an advertisement in another column, it will be seen that a Bazaar is to be held in the St. Lawrence Hall, on Wednesday and Thursday, 21st and 22nd inst., in aid of the fund for supporting an anti-slavery paper."

Now, Mr. Editor, that the public may not be misled with regard to the said anti-slavery paper, I beg to state that it is a paper established on the other side of the line (in Rochester), with funds originally given by the British people. Whether its course has fulfilled the expectations of its original donors, is a question they themselves can best answer. One thing is quite certain, that a large majority of the intelligent colored people of this province believe that it is opposed to the best interests of those whose cause it professes to advocate. Hence the colored people of this province, and some of their friends, felt the necessity of making an effort to establish a paper in this province to sustain their views, and give correct information respecting the abundant resources of this noble province, and the advantages that will accrue to those of our brethren who will emigrate to it from American oppression. Now, that paper, whose friends are seeking funds here for its support (evidently in opposition to the one started here by the colored people), is opposed to the emigration of colored people to any British province, and does all in its power to induce the fugitive from slavery to settle down in the nominally free Staes, in which they are constantly liable to be taken back to their former bondage. The colored people here are surprised that Mr. Douglass should not see fit to come to this city to get up a bazaar in support of his paper until they had started the Freeman, and are still more surprised that those who invite him here, should send abroad to beg money for the refugees of this province and then to invite an individual here to raise money, to support a paper hostile to this province. Verily, consistency is a jewel seldom to be met with.

Slavery now Existing in Nebraska.

In any ordinary case I should be very loth to expose a brother Missionary, but the case now before us is one of so monstrous a character as to forbid longer silence.

It may not be generally known that there is in this Territory an extensive Missionary establishment, under the direction and control of the Methodist Church South, at which slaves have long been kept to do the menial service of the Mission. These slaves have been kept here in utter disregard of the Missouri Compromise, by which Slavery was forever prohibited here.

It would seem to a candid thinker a difficult matter to conceive a grosser inconsistency than to go forth to preach Christianity to the heathen, and to carry slaves along to assist in the glorious work. Thus, while they would hold up the Gospel to the heathen with one hand, with the other they bind fast the yoke of bondage on the neck of the poor slave. How can they show any consistency in such a monstrous absurdity?—On what grounds should one portion of the human family be degraded and heathenized to elevate and enlighted another?

But to come nearer to the point—Thomas Johnson, the superintendent of this slave-holding mission, by adroit management was elected last fall a delegate to Congress from this Territory, or, rather, was sent to Washington to attend to matters pertaining to the various tribes of Indians here, preparatory to selling their lands and organizing a Territorial Government. He has been at Washington during the present session of Congress, where he has been using all his influence to secure the passage of Douglas' Nebraska Bill; and he has not scrupled to make any unfair statements to promote his ends. He is using his utmost endeavours to induce those Indians to sell out their lands entire—a thing which they are very unwilling to do, and which would be very disastrous to their best interests.

They have emigrated, to make room for the white man, until they can go no further. There are no lands suitable for them. Most of the vast region between this and the Rocky Mountains is a barren desert, and wholly unfit for cultivation. These Indians are disposed to sell all the land they do not need, but they wish to be allowed to remain here in peace and quiet, for they know not where to go. But this Christian Missionary would send them away. Does he care whither? It is believed that he intends to secure to himself a fat portion of these poor Indians' lands. And he would plant Slavery here; yes, has introduced it here in violation of the laws of the land. And yet we are to believe that he is a minister of the gospel of Christ.

Fugitive Slave Excitement in Manchester, N. H.

MANCHESTER, N. H., June 12, 1854.

Much excitement was caused here yesterday and to-day, by a report that two persons from Virginia had arrived at Lowell, in search of Edwin Moore, a coloured barber, formerly resident in Lowell, and now keeping a shop here.

Moore is alleged to have escaped from Virginia, where he was a slave, twelve years since. A purse was made up for him today, and at noon he took the cars for Canada, accompanied by his wife and three children.

SLAVERY IN CALIFORNIA—PROSPECT OF ITS ESTABLISHMENT.

Two years ago a law was passed by the California Legislature, granting one year to the owners of slaves carried into the territory previous to the adoption of the Constitution, to remove them beyond the limits of the State. Last year the provision of this law was extended twelve months longer. We learn by the late California papers that a bill has just passed the Assembly, by a vote of 33 to 21, continuing the same law in force until 1855. The provision of this bill embrace slaves who have been carried to California since the adoption of her Constitution, as well as those who were there previously. The large majority by which it passed, and the opinions advanced during the discussion, indicate a more favorable state of sentiment in regard to the rights of slaveholders in California than we supposed existed. [The Mississippian.

The act here rejoiced over establishes Slavery in California as thoroughly as the heart of a slave-breeder could desire. Of course, it is flagrantly unconstitutional; but how will that help its poor victims? Do you suppose the gigantic swindle, Sham Democracy, which elected a Legislature to do so wicked an act, is not equally potent in the choice of its Judiciary? If you do you are easily duped. It is just as easy to sustain wicked laws as to pass them, when the supposed interests of unprincipled men are to be promoted thereby. Only in Anti-Slavery, aroused and guided by a Free Press, is there any protection against such crimes as above recorded. Slavery would in time insinuate itself even into Vermont, if it were not for concerted, persistent resistance to it.

A San Francisco paper is giving portraits of the men who compose the present Legislature of that State, giving only initials, but painting them so that all who know may recognize them. Here is one of their biographies, condensed:

H——finished his boyhood in perfecting himself in every existing vice at Natchez-under-the-Hill, Miss., whence his father sent him to an inland brother to reform. Here he seduced a cousin of his own age (eighteen,) and she, disgraced and ruined, fled with him to New Orleans, where he lived awhile by gambling, and finally migrated with her to San Francisco. Here he flourished awhile as a blackleg, but finally his luck turned—he was cleaned out—and at last sold out his paramour cousin to a luckier gambler for money. She refused to be transferred, when he beat her brutally over the head, until he left her motionless, insensible, and as he supposed dead, on the floor of their lodging; when he ran away to an interior county and set up for a politician. He was successful, as his presence in the Legislature attests. Such characters abound in all newly settled regions where time has not been given for educing Social Order from Chaos. Shall we confer on such the power of imposing Slavery on unborn generations?—N. Y. Tribune.

Nine Fugitive Slaves Arrested.

Last evening, about 7 o'clock, U. S. Deputy Marshal Thayer, in company with officer Lee, and the sheriff of Boone county, Kentucky, captured nine negroes, who were on their way to Canada, about one mile from the Lunatic Asylum.

They were on foot, and had their baggage on their backs. Their clothing is torn and ragged, and they present a deplorable condition. When first seized they at first resisted, but finally consented, when assured that they were in the custody of officers.—The slaves were marched back to the city and lodged in the Ninth street watch house. The warrant was issued by U. S. Commissioner, John L. Pendry, before whom the fugitives will be brought this morning for examination under the new fugitive slave law. The slaves escaped from their master, Wm. Walton, of Boone county, Ky., a night or two since. Their names are Shadricks, Lewis, Lee, Anderson, four men, Almeda, and another woman, name unknown, and her two sons, Wesley and John, and a small girl.—Cin. Gaz.

Grand Trunk Works in England instead of Canada.

We observe a grand puff going the rounds of the press for the Grand Trunk Works, recently commenced at Birkenhead. the Galt Reporter makes the following pertinent remarks on the puff:—

"There is one thing must strike every Canadian most acutely, when reading the description of these most extensive works, and the invigorating effect they must have upon the trade and business of the locality—why these works are not placed in Canada, instead of Birkenhead. A Canadian railroad, involving an expenditure of some nine millions of money, is let out for construction to English contractors, at exorbitantly high rates; and the Province has already sent these contractors, in the face of their promise to find the means of prosecuting their work, if the job fell into their hands, some three millions of money, which must be paid by the Province, principal and interest, should the line fail to pay itself.—This is surely bad enough, and sufficient to blast the character of the Canadian minister who connived at such downright robbery of the Canadian people. But when to all these wrongs, is added that of expending the money so lent, or a large portion of it, in a distant country, the Canadian people have a just cause of loud complaint. Why could not the £10,000 wages paid monthly to the mechanics of Birkenhead, have been scattered amongst the mechanics of Canada. How is it that a Canadian minister has led the people of Canada into an immense responsibility, and yet allow another country to reap the benefits of that responsibility? Well may the people of Canada look upon the Grand Trunk Line as a "job" of the first magnitude, concocted for the aggrandizement of the parties concerned in it."

The Montreal Gazette also says:

"The people of Canada were told, before the contract was signed, that Canadian hands were to be employed in this work, just the same as if Canadian mechanics had got the contracts themselves. The extract says that "all the large bridges on the Canada railway are to be tubular." The truth is that not one of them is to be "tubular." They are all to be girder bridges. We hope the other items of information are more correct than this one. As the whole of the mechanical labour is to be done in England, the patronising assurance given by Mr. Jackson to the mechanics of Montreal, will not be carried out. He confidently promised them that he was to do his mechanical work here, that he had also their good in view in this respect, as he would bring out men who would instruct the mechanics of this country how to handle tools."

The Annexation of the Canadas.

The Albany Evening Journal seems to discover the shadow of Canadian Annexation and discourses upon it in this wise:

"The question of Reciprocal Trade with Canada is just now being discussed with unusual earnestness by several of our cotemporaries.

"A commercial union with the Provinces would have an important influence upon the question of their ultimate annexation to this country. This subject has seldom been earnestly agitated on this side of the line. If (as is too probable) the borders of Slavery are to be continually extended, even at the hazard of the Union itself, 'very many of the North, who have either been indifferent or opposed to the Annexation of the Canadas, will be found cheerfully supporting any measure which will pave the way to such a result.' There is little reason to believe that Great Britain deems the possession of her Northern Provinces essential either to her political or commercial greatness. The United States have been worth far more to her as an independent Republic, than they would have been as Colonies. The same thing would be true if the Canadas should swing in the same haven. It would require less effort to secure them from England, with her millions of freemen, than to obtain Cuba from Spain with her millions of slaves. But as freemen are not a marketable commodity, (out of Congress) the Canadas will be permitted to remain in quiet possession of England, while to procure Cuba we are likely to be plunged into war."

As to the "influence" of Reciprocal Trade upon the question of Annexation, there is quite a diversity of opinion. The main question to be considered is, what condition of affairs must exist between the Mother Country and her Colonies before it can take place. As to the action of Great Britain, we must forget entirely her spirit of national dignity to suppose she would listen to such a proposition for a moment, without powerful reasons on the part of the Colonies themselves. As to profit and loss, it is extremely ridiculous to talk of government of first rank in civilization being governed by such considerations in matters of this kind, national pride and the interest of the dependencies must decide. Now, what reasons could we ever urge upon England for a peaceful separation? Shall we earnestly think of such a thing without some substantial, powerful, and reasonable excuse? Will it be because she has placed the management of our own affairs in our own hands? Will it be because she has given every thing we have asked for? Will it be because we are receiving the full benefit of Reciprocal Trade and every liberal doctrine of the age?

Must we, after every demand has been satisfied, every grievance redressed, every favor granted, play the part of the serpent and betray our benefactor? What demand would she not grant before sacrificing her pride in giving away the brightest jewels in her Crown? Under the progress of liberal opinions, it will be a long time before we shall have any real grievance to drive us to such a step. To suppose the Colonies could entertain such a notion without some weighty reason, is only to evince among our neighbors a very superficial knowledge of our character and national spirit. That England would turn her Colonies into the American confederacy, to cure their evils and perpetuate their institutions, is to suppose she would foster and establish a government founded in rebellion to her own.

We see no probability as long as peace lasts, for a crisis to arise, which will demand a decisive consideration of this subject, by the Canadas. Commercial union to our minds only extends the time. Deny us this, keep out the light of commerce, hamper our energies by artificial restraints, foster judicial or clerical corruption, limit the elective franchise, and put it out of our power to effect every species of commercial, judicial, or social reform, and immediate annexation is certain. But this is not the course England is pursuing. She has had one lesson. She has profitted by it. Do you imagine for a moment that the American Colonies would have rebelled, had the commercial policy of England been changed? England has been no idle observer of the progress of liberal sentiment, and the experiments going on before her eyes, in political economy. She has embodied the policy of the age in her councils and administration at home and abroad, so far as the safety and character of her people would admit. For the last half century her Ministers have been in advance of her people, while before that they were behind.

She is giving her Colonies the full force of that policy, and allowing them to shape out their own destiny, upon the united wisdom of Her Counsellors, and the broad basis of Her Constitution.—Express and Journal.

What England is Doing.

One grumbler—well gifted in the way of a querulous temper and a garrulous tongue—can make more of a sensation than any fifty pleasant men. It is not to be wondered at, any more than that a small furnace should send smoke enough up a factory chimney to form a big cloud and hide a fourth of the sky, or that a kettle-drum should be heard further than a Cathedral organ. Grumblers are always resolute people. They take society by the ears, and determine to push in pretty much as men seize a door-knob and turn the latch. Of late years, we have had grumblers organized into a regiment. They are now on the army roll, mustered as ministers, sappers, artillerists, light-horsemen, and Joan of Arcs. Some jump into Master Peter's Puppet Show for the rescue of Melisindra, and call to the heavens, descending to meet their voices, "Would that this could have been seen by all the despisers of knight-errantry!" others, not so select and tasteful throw bomb-shells into hornets' nests, while not a few are content to flourish wooden swords and march on Gibraltar with toy cannon.

Of late years, the steamers from Liverpool have been bringing an extra mail-bag of grumbling. The groans of many of John Bull's children have been collected therein, and on their escape from the padlock, they have rambled about over the country rather alarmingly. Things across the water, put up in the shape of reports for this side of the water, have sounded badly. Devout old men have been disturbed, and Millennialists have taken occasion to review ancient prophecies. Sanitory Reports—Workhouse Documents—Factory Commissions—Alton Lockes and Yeast—London Poor and Mayhew Literature—Harriet Martineau's fall into Atheism and Carlyle's Sterling—Troubles among Wesleyan Methodists and Maurice's last Lectureship—have all been considered as very bad omens of very bad times. If these ærolites fall so fast and thick, the volcanoes of the moon must be in commotion.

But the other side should be known. Grumblers are not the only people in the world. There are some editors left—there are men to write and to read. "The fifth stage" of the proceedings has been reached, and rebutters are in order. We have taken no little interest of late in our mother country; indeed, we have been aprehensive, from the tidings received through the grumblers, that she would soon need our offices in a friendly way. This has induced us to look into her affairs with a sharp eye. We are now prepared to make a partial report of our examinations.

Our mother still keeps house on the Island, and her domestic affairs are decidedly improving. Having removed certain restrictions on the food trade, she has given a great impulse to her children. There is much more bread. There is, consequently, more cooking and eating. Her agriculture is being stimulated, so that the face of the country is rapidly changing. Hedges are lessening, and woods are being concentrated. Manure is being brought from the Pacific. She has a good deal of vacant land to put it on, and busy are the hands that spread and turn it into the astonished soil. The increase of food has revived and encouraged manufactures and commerce. But this is not all. The ratio of marriages is augmented. Young people are doing more courting, and houses are in demand. What is still more encouraging, persons are marrying at an earlier age. Malthus is going down—Dr. Franklin is going up.

The whole country is stirring with educational discussions, and much is doing in a practical way. There is evident progress, for we see that there are 17,015 Church of England schools; 1,500 schools of the British and Foreign School Society; besides other schools. The Privy Council is offering a very encouraging hand to build up old schools and to establish new; and altogether, the prospect is encouraging. In the matter of sentiment, the good work is advancing. Poverty is more cared for, sympathized with, and aided. The nomadic hordes of the metropolis are being gathered in, and these wanderers of the wilderness are finding rest and habitation. Away from home, the mother is likewise up and stirring. Her 43 Colonies have rights and privileges very freely accorded, and she is on good terms with the most of them. Australia is doing wonders—Mrs. Chisholm has been doing greater wonders. A list of great apostles is filling up, and both sexes are shining in the calendar. John Pounds, the poor shoemaker, is there; Margaret Fry is registered; Thomas Chalmers flames out gloriously.

The great Learned Societies are uncommonly active. All attempts to hold the savans together in the Royal Society—the same society on which Charles II. bestowed a gilt Mace and a Royal Title, and to which Newton, Boyle and Montague belonged—all these attempts having failed, sundry other Societies, amounting to fourteen prominent Institutions, sprang into existence. They are very flourishing. Whether the telescope or microscope, the barometer or the blowpipe, is doing the more, we cannot say; but between all of them, Nature is being deprived of all privacy. She has to make her toilet in public. Indeed, she is fast becoming a member of every body's family, with no house of her own.

Filibusters will pay due regard to these facts. They are reliable. Our mother is not decaying. Her Island is not ready for us. If certain fast men are engaging their furniture for Windsor Castle, or even Gore House, they had better wait, we think, a few days.—New York Times.

The Reciprocity Treaty.

The following are understood to be the provisions of the reciprocity treaty just concluded between Great Britain and the United States:—

Article 1. Opens the British American Fisheries, except those of Newfoundland, to the inhabitants of both countries, except the mouths of rivers, shad, salmon and shellfish.

Art. 2. Provides for arbitration in the event of any dispute arising about the fishing. Each party chooses an arbitrator, and if they cannot agree upon a third party they draw cuts for choice. Fixes 36th parallel of north latitude as the point to which British subjects are admitted in the American Fisheries, with the exceptions above noted.

Art. 3. Provides for the free exchange between the two countries of the following articles: Flour and meat, breadstuffs, all kinds of animals, fresh, smoked and salted meats, cotton, wool, seeds and vegetables, fruit, dried and undried, fish of all kinds, produce of fish and oil, other creatures in the water, poultry and eggs, hides, furs, skins or tails undressed, stone or marble in its crude or unwrought state, slate, butter, cheese, tallow, lard, horns, manure, ores of metals of all kinds, coal, pitch, tar, turpentine and ashes, timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, manufactured in whole or in part, fire-wood, plants, shrubs and tress, broom corn, bark, gypsum, ground and unground, horns, rough, wrought or unwrought, burr stones, dyestuffs, flax, hemp and tow manufactured, manufactured tobacco, and rags.

Art. 4. Provides for the navigation of the St. Lawrence, and the Canadian Canals, and Lake Michigan, by the vessels of both nations, on equal terms, the tolls levied on all vessels being the same and the United States Government undertakes to urge upon the state governments the propriety of opening their canals to Canadians. Great Britain may withdraw the free navigation of our waters, but in that event the Americans suspend the rights conferred by article three.

Art. 5. Declares that the ratifications shall be exchanged in six months, or sooner if possible.

Art. 6. Includes Newfoundland, in case Great Baitain and the Legislature of Newfoundland make the necessary provision to that end.

Summary.

COBOURG, June 20, 1854.

Last night about 12 o'clock, flames were discovered breaking out of the R. Catholic church in this place, the alarm was given and the engines promptly on the spot, but the fire had gained such headway that it was imposible to save the building. At one time fears were entertained that the dwelling house occupied by the priest would share the same fate, but by the unremitting exertions of the firemen it was saved. The church was partially insured.

KINGSTON, June 20, 1854.

Last night at 12 o'clock, a fire was discovered in the back premises of Mr. Armstrong, hardware merchant. The firemen were soon on the spot, and the fire was checked, but he sustained considerable damage by fire and water.

STAMPEDE OF SLAVES.—During Tuesday night, twenty-three negroes owned in Grant and adjoining counties, left their master's roofs, and escaped to Licking River, where they lashed together several canoes, and in disguise they rowed down the Licking River to the Ohio, and thence down to a point near the Sylvan House, where they disembarked, and made a circuitous route to the northern part of the city. Early yesterday morning, they were run off on the route to Canada, by the underground railway.—Cin. Atlas.

SUDDEN DEATH: SINGULAR COINCIDENCE.—Henry Feister, Esq., Member of the Legislative Assembly of Washington Territory from Pacific county, dropped dead very suddenly on the morning after his arrival at Olympia. Connected this with lamentable event there is a singular coincidence, viz: J. L. Brown was first nominated in Pacific county for the Legislature. Just before the day of election, Mr. Brown died suddenly, whereupon the people elected Mr. Scudder. A few days after the election Mr. Scudder died after a short illness, (as we are informed.) A special election was ordered by the Governor, and Mr. Feister was elected to fill the vacancy created by the death of Mr. Scudder. The next morning after Mr. Feister arrived at Olympia, the seat of Government, where the Legislature was in session, he fell from his seat and instantly expired.

THE CRYSTAL PALACE AT SYDENHAM.—One of the most remarkable things about the Crystal Palace is that the visitors were never so numerous as they have been since the issue of a peremptory order for their entire exclusion. On Tuesday the building was crowded with fashionable visitors, lords and ladies, Members of both Houses of Parliament, literary celebrities, and foreigners of every rank and complexion. A party of Dutchmen, headed by an interpreter, had come all the way from Rotterdam to see the Crystal Palace. Messrs. Collards have entered into negotiations with Mr. Deane for placing a magnificent piano in the music court. Among the arrangements made by the Drectors for a pictorial record of the striking features of the interior, we are happy to add an agreement with Mr. Baxter, the inventor and patentee of the beautiful art of printing in colours. Mr. Baxter's pictures of the Crystal Palace of 1851 have been generally pronounced to be much more striking and attractive than the larger and more ambitious prints. In the representation of sculpture, the art is peculiarly successful, and seeing the number and variety of the casts in the Crystal Palace, it is not too much to expect that this new series will be generally popular. The booksellers' walk progresses favourably, many leading firms having sent in their adhesion.—British Banner.

A WOMAN IN MALE TOGGERY IN OHIO.—A female was arrested in Dayton lately as the cats were about starting for this city, whose case is some what mysterious. The Empire says she stated that she was a resident of Cleveland, and had donned the male attire for the purpose of following her husband, who had run away from her, taking with him her three children, to go, as she believed to California. She was going to follow him across the frontier to San Francisco. She was induced to resume her female dress, for fear, if discovered by the officers, she would be arrested and imprisoned. The gentleman alluded to, gave her a dress, and she is now in this city, but what she intends to do, we are not informed. She is good-looking, appears to be respectable, is about thirty-two years of age, and gives her name as Mrs. Spofford. She carries a hatchet to defend herself. The lady was requested to return to Cleveland, being offered a pass, but she refused to go, and now like the chap who won the elephant at the raffle, the officer doesn't know what to do with her.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

TO PROTECT HORSES FROM FLIES.—Take two or three handfuls of walnut leaves, upon which pour two or three quarts of cold water. Let it soak one night, and pour the whole next morning into a kettle, and boil for a quarter of an hour; when cold it is fit for use. Moisten a spunge with it, and before a horse gets out of the stable, let those parts which are most irritable be smeared over with the liquor. Every "merciful man" who uses a horse during the hot weather should promote his comfort by this simple measure.

☞ The funded debt of all the European States is about £9,500,000,000, or $40 to each inhabitant. Switzerland is the only country out of debt.

☞ On Thursday, the 18th inst., the agent of the Virginia Colonization Society, embarked on board the ship Sophia Walker, in Hampton Roads, 115 coloured emigrants for Liberia.

☞ The New Orleans Bulletin notices the arrest, in that city of a colored woman for using cruel and unusual instruments of torture in punishing her slaves.

An agriculturist, who has tried the experiment, satisfactorily, says that a few seeds of tomato, dropped into the hill with cucumbers, or a tomato set out, which he says is the better mode, will keep off black fleas and striped bugs, as they dislike the flavor of the tomato.

Land Sales.

A correspondent inquires concerning lands. In reply we give the following abstract of lands now for sale:

Mr. Edward Emery, of London, C. W., advertises an important sale of Town lots, to take place on the 19th day of June. Terms of payment, one-eighth down, or by notes at three or six months, if required; the balance in ten equal annual payments, with interest.

F. B. Beddome offers for sale a valuable farm also 2½ miles from London, parts of Lot No. 1, 2d Concession of Lobo; also wild lands, lot 3, 1st concession, four miles from the town.

Mr. H. B. Hope, Toronto, offers 400 acres in North Gwilliambury, 50 acres in North Orillia, 100 in Tay, 100 in Medonte.

S. M. Sandford offers lot 19, 3d Concession Township of Vespra, containing 190 acres—40 cleared, within 3 miles of Barrie. East half lot 9, 13th Concession, Innisfield, near Barrie Depot Northern railroad. South half No. 15 7th Concession, Nottawasaga, 20 acres cleared.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence on this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to advocate the cause of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief on the arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon almost summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the cruel lash only is spared. Their fears are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require upon they become employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are but in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not to be an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not absolutely to be set aside to maintain absolute paupers in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and civilization of these negro refugees, both of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the complexion mentioned deters a population, and thus remains the despised race, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair—after an Address from Rev. S. R. Ward, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Country—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B. Gribble, and seconded by the Rev. Thomas James, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and passed

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. Samuel R. Ward, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after leaving their escape from the United States and being that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Poetry.

A True Knight.

Though he lived and died among us,
Yet his name may be enrolled
With the knights whose deeds of daring
Ancient chronicles have told.

Still a stripling, he encountered
Poverty, and struggled long,
Gathering force from every effort,
Till he knew his arm was strong.

Then his heart and life he offered
To his radiant mistress, Truth;
Never thought or dream or faltering
Marred the promise of his youth.

And he rode forth to defend her,
And her peerless worth proclaim—
Challenging each recreant doubter
Who aspersed her spotless name.

First upon his path stood Ignorance,
Insolent in his brutal might—
But the blows and long the battle
Soon the monster took to flight.

Then, with light and fearless spirit,
Prejudice he dared to brave—
Hunted from its lurking craven
To its black sulphureous cave.

Perfidy by his servile minions,
Thus the arrogant Custom rose:
Yet he too at last was conquered
By the good knight's weighty blows.

Then he turned, and, flushed with victory,
Struck upon the brazen shield
Of the world's great king, Opinion,
And defied him to the field.

Once again he rose a conqueror,
And, though wounded in the fight,
With a dying smile of triumph
Saw that Truth had gained her right.

On his failing ear re-echoing
Came the shouting round her throne;
Little cared he that no future
With her name would link his own.

Spent with many a hard-fought battle,
Slowly ebbed his life away,
And the crowd that flocked to greet her
Trampled on him where he lay.

Gathering all his strength, he saw her
Crowned, and reigning in her pride—
Looked his last upon her beauty,
Raised his eyes to God, and died.

Agricultural.

Root Culture—Long Carrots, &c.

Root culture, for the last few years, has been receiving increased attention; yet the importance and profitableness of such crops are yet by no means duly appreciated.—Every farmer has his wheat, his corn, his hay, oat and potato fields—his hay, corn and oats, raised with special reference to the winter's supply of food for his domestic animals, yet, not one in fifty probably, has his carrot, beet or turnip field, notwithstanding the root crop is not less profitable or important, as food for stock, than that of hay or grain.

Aside from the amount of feed derivable from a limited space, roots possess other, and perhaps not less important advantages.—Stock, grass-fed through the grass-growing season, and treated to dry hay and grain through the winter, feel, most decidedly, the change, in consequence of which their liability to disease and death is very materially enhanced. And where the change is not productive of positive disease, the growth and thriftiness of animals are very materially diminished. Now, when stock are fed roots in proper quantities, in connection with the usual dry food of winter, they retain, if otherwise properly cared for, the health and thrift of the grazing season. Cows, thus treated, give much more milk, of a better quality than those fed exclusively on hay; and it has been repeatedly demonstrated that horses can be cheaper kept, and in better condition when carrots are regularly fed to them, in connection with hay and oats, than when treated to the latter materials alone.

The question is frequently asked, which is the most profitable crop, all things considered, the carrot, beet, or turnip? The question has been differently answered, each having its advocates for superior claims.—A correspondent of the American Agriculturist, of the 15th of March, says of the sugar beet, "it is a great yielder, hardy, easily raised, and is superior we think to any vegetable grown, for milch cows and fattening cattle, especially, when fed raw." Again: the sugar beet does best in moderately rich loamy soil, but will grow where any other root does.

We experienced a little last year in root raising, the result of which does not support this last assertion. The experiment we here subjoin. During the second week in May last, we sowed the Orange carrot, the white French sugar beet, and the Russia turnip, side by side, upon a light gravelly soil: the preparation and after-culture was in every particular alike. The season was an extremely dry one; corn, upon the same field, proved almost a failure, in consequence of the drouth. The beets and turnips seemed to suffer much, and the carrots scarce at all. At harvest time, the yield of the carrots per rod, was more than triple that of the turnips or beets. The carrots were sown in drills, two feet apart, with a row of onions between each. The yield was at the rate of about 750 bushels per acre. It is to be remembered that two crops were taken from the same ground; the onions being, perhaps, more exhausting to the soil than the carrots. Had the ground been wholly devoted to the latter, the yield would probably have been at the rate of 1400 or 1500 bushels per acre. We harvested one carrot, which, when the top was cut close to the crown of the root, measured, to its fibrous extremity 4 feet ten inches; and several others, the length of which exceeded three feet. When we consider the depth to which this root penetrates, the reason why it suffers so little by drouth is certainly apparent

We have given no direction for the cultivation of the carrot, that not being the object of the present communication. We leave that, perhaps for a subsequent paper, or, more probably, for those of more experience in their culture.—Country Gentleman.

The Use of Flour.

It is an astonishing fact that so little is generally known concerning the effects of an extensive use of so common an article as fine and superfine wheat flour. These effects, however, have been long well known to physicians; and the ideas advanced in the following extract from the work on the Preservation of Health, by Dr. J. C. Warren, though not entirely new, should serve to draw public attention to a subject of vital interest to every one.

The cerealia were perhaps the earliest, the most general, and the most valuable articles of human food. Wheat, rye, barley, oats and maize are employed in different countries according to the properties of the soil and the taste of the inhabitants. Wheat seems to be more extensively used than either of the others, and is perhaps the most palatable and the most digestible. This grain is not used entire. It consists of, principally two coverings, or parts containing, and the flour, or part contained. In the early ages of the world, these were probably employed together; but art has been directed to their separation, and has reduced the flour as nearly as possible, to the state of impalpable powder.

Flour, taken apart from its coverings, has a most constipating property. Its great use by inhabitants of towns and cities, will, therefore, go far to explain why constipation is so general. The separation of the coverings from the flour, as usually practiced, seems to counteract the intentions of nature, which undoubtedly destined them to be employed together. The external skin of the grain, thus thrown away, contains important properties, and instead of being in a great measure rejected, it should be altogether preserved and ground up with the flour. This substance which is known by the name of bran, is the part which prevents the flour from producing costiveness.

About the year 1835, I began to use bread in which the bran was retained; and after having employed it a considerable time in my own family, I ventured to recommend it to others. For some time it was ridiculed under the name of saw-dust bread; but finally, in a very slow way, it came to be employed by a large number of persons, its valuable properties were ascertained and admitted, and it has now come into general use.

Some years ago it occurred to me that as the brown wheat bread was beneficial on account of its coarseness, but was not sufficiently active in all cases, it might be well to use the wheat in a coarser state, and without making it into bread. I therefore directed some wheat to be ground in a coffee mill, and after boiling three or four hours, a little salt having been added, it was found very palatable. The substance had a better effect in preventing constipation of the bowels than any article of food I have ever met with, after many years observation and inquiry.

The preparation of it, consists in washing clean in cold water, then in boiling from three to four hours, adding water from time to time, sufficient to bring it out with about the consistency of hominy or boiled rice.—The longer it is boiled the more agreeable it is, but less effectual. A moderate degree of fluidity (for instance, that of boiled rice or hominy) renders it more laxative.

Superfine flour bread, as has been stated above, is not a healthy article of food for man or animals. Animals, so far as I have observed, do not like and for the most part cannot live upon fine bread; whereas many animals, even carnivorous, can subsist on coarse wheat bread. Dogs, according to the French physiologists, die after feeding about three weeks on fine bread, but will live on coarse bread an indefinite time. Birds are very fond of coarse bread and of cracked wheat hominy, which they eat with avidity, and it agrees with them. There is reason to believe that the vertibrated animals generally can be subsisted on coarse bread, but not on fine. Many persons object to coarse bread, that it is not so agreeable as fine. This sentiment is the result of habit, for those who have been accustomed to use the coarse bread for a reasonable time, find it sweeter to the taste and more satisfying to the stomach than the other. It seems, then, unfortunate that fine flour, an article of food which is deficient in some principle necessary to its healthy action of the animal economy, should have been so long employed, and so widely spread among the population of cities, and, in truth, among a great mass of people elsewhere.

Since I have made use of the coarse wheat, I have had frequent communications on the subject with professional friends, as well as with many other individuals, and find that generally they are satisfied of its valuable effects.

In concluding this subject it must be stated that of all the articles of food which, in the course of fifty years practice, I have had occasion to recommend for the prevention of a constipated state of the bowels, and its consecutive evils, this cracked wheat is the most effectual.

Now that the properties of coarse wheat bread are extensively admitted, it appears wonderful that authors and practitioners should not have brought forward at an earlier period, to the public knowledge and for the public use, properties so very valuable.

Economy in Food.

In an article under this head, the N. Y. Tribune, after denouncing meat, and at all events fresh meat, as an unnecessarily expensive diet for dwellers in cities, discourses thus concerning divers other articles of food:

As for potatoes, nine-tenths of them at this time in this city are not wholesome food, and they are the dearest article that is sold for the sustenance of men. The prices that old potatoes are retailed at is equal to five cents a pound, and those from Bermuda eight cents, and the little watery, precocious, unhealthy things, called "new potatoes," are sold at a price equal to twelve cents per pound. At the same time, good family flour is sold for six cents, and yet every body cries "what a dreadful price!" But there is cheaper food than flour; not only more economical, but more healthy, particularly for a variation of diet. One thing is the various preparations of Indian corn—the poorest of all is the meal ground almost as fine as flour, which almost spoils it for bread.—Then there is the article known at the South and West, where it is extensively used, under the name of hominy. Here it is called samp, and is sold at about $2,50 a bushel, and one bushel is worth more than four bushels of potatoes. It is a good, wholesome economical food. But a more generally acceptable article is called hominy here, at the West, grits. The first is hulled corn, the grains left nearly whole; the latter is hulled corn, cracked into grains about the size of bird-seed shot, or coarse gunpowder. It sells for three and three and a half cents a pound. Both are cooked by soaking and slow boiling for hours, in clear water, and when eaten as a substitute for vegetables, with meat, are seasoned with salt and a very little butter. Both are very good with meat gravy, or with sugar or molasses. By the bye, sugar and molasses are the cheapest articles of food in New York, and children should be allowed a free use of them upon the score of economy.

Another article is the kiln dried sweet corn, which, though more expensive than either of the two preceding articles, is nevertheless more economical than meat, potatoes, and cabbage and all sorts of green trash now in market, and it is acceptable to almost every palate that appreciates corn when in the roasting ear.

Another cheap wholesome food is wheat grits. At present owing to the advance in grain, this preparation is much higher than common, but cheaper than flour, and more healthy.

Dry beans and peas are also articles that should enter much more into the consumption of all who study economy in food. We believe that a dollar's worth of either would go farther than six dollar's worth of fresh meat, or ten dollar's worth of potatoes.

Rice is another article of food, and when mixed with sugar, particularly so. You had better feed a hungry beggar upon rice pudding than the cheapest fresh meat you can buy.

Eggs, even at the usual high prices, are cheaper than butcher's meat, and as with rice if you add sugar to them, you will be able to feed a hungry family far more economically than your are doing at present.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and Social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the Gospel. Tribune his special study, examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Lately, his position as Publisher of the Scripture Manual has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the Tribune's Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will confer a favor by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers and one of the Books in substantial leather Binding of the Paper one year, to every ten Subscribers names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, Robert Dick, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the Tribune's object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

Men and Brethren:—The time has now fully come, when we, as a downtrodden people, should do something to relieve, and that by those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted right, composing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the whole population in which we live. The policy necessary to the preservation of this element must be at our command, if ever we expect the enjoyment of equal rights and equality of rights [illegible] men in favor of emigration to the British Provinces, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the objects and objects set forth in this Call. The Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is now [illegible] be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be [illegible] There is no part of the [illegible] and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here [illegible] account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and [illegible] gents but with our last breath [illegible] emigration is of vital importance [illegible] manned by all delegated assemblage as heretofore met, we [illegible] and will not [illegible] called; and deny the right of [illegible] bond or dearest brother to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage [illegible] to show in Convention as the West Indies Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those entitled with us in race, and what is more, whose [illegible] continent all stand with open arms to welcome millions importuning us in the time of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause and share one common fate on the continent.

In Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held and there the number will be decided by the Convention when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place [illegible] for holding the Convention [illegible] a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend. Therefore it may [illegible] of the greatest gathering of the colored people ever [illegible] in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that they may be arranged and attached to the Call, free names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

On the Burial of the Venerable H.T.S.——h.

Lie there, thou noble man of God!
Thy friends all weep around thy tomb,
While fall their tears upon the sod,
Which above thy lowly grave shall bloom;
Diffusing thro' the air perfume,
While we'll bemoan thy solemn doom.

A dastard wretch, his hearse refused, *
A vassal to his filthy gain,—
A frame without a soul infused!
Yet passing o'er "life's solemn main,"
And love of lucre gives him pain,
While servile acts his person stain.

Alas! thy brows were shaded o'er,
And thou wast numbered with the race,
Whose destiny we oft deplore:
Though calm composure graced thy face,
And saint-like smiles we oft could trace,
Yet, thou wast treated with disgrace!

"But sleep on now, and take thy rest,"
May naught disturb thy deep repose:
Thy son, while beats his guileless breast,
May note each sprig or vine which grows
Upon thy grave—and sigh when snows,
Shall shroud thy mound—its turf enclose.

A Mail Agent's Story.

The following account of a transaction, in which the narrator was one of the parties concerned, is given to show the terrific dangers to which persons in the railroad employ are subject, and also as a remarkable instance of escape from what might seem a certain death. The story is related as nearly as possible in the words of the mail agent himself.

I was at one time in the employ of the Government as Mail Agent, and on the day in which the following event occurred, which was of a Saturday, about the middle of May, 18—, I was running down with one of the English mails from N. Y. to B. The dispatch of these trains was irregular, and depended upon the will of the Chief Postmaster, and they have since, I think, been entirely given up.

At about 6 P. M. we reached S———, that busiest and prettiest of all the inland New England cities. The trees were just putting on their first garments of fresh leaves, and the wide fields began to shine with verdure, and every boy and girl seemed to have found some new sport and to utter some new kind of shout, as we dashed into the old depot, with a shriek from the engine (a very powerful one of the first class, called the Ætna,) enough to take one's hair off his head. All I had on the train was just one car behind the tender, carrying the great mail, some valuable express matter, and a live brakeman. I used to think myself a great man in those days, when I was entrusted sometimes with half a million of property, but I had good reason to change my mind before I was over with this special trip, that I'll be bound. What is any amount of dollars and cents, compared with the risk that a man must run who is at the head of an express mail train? We halted in the S——— depot just long enough to wood and water, seize upon a mug of piping-hot chicory coffee, and a bit of greasy paste, concealing a slab of dried of dried apple-sauce, and called in courtesy, a pie. When springing on the train, we left the station somewhat before sunset, and were soon flying along at a headlong pace, in the direction of the seaboard.

Now I doubt not, to you and other gentlemen who are in the habit of sitting in a comfortable railroad car, on a stuffed seat, reading the last news from Europe or the pages of some entertaining novel, the mode of travel and the various little incidents on the road seem very delightful. But the thing is very different when you are perched on the seat of the engine, and going down the road at the rate of fifty miles an hour, a velocity not rarely attained where the track is in good order, and getting over the ground, the sole consideration in view. I could not endure the solitude of the mail car, and almost uniformly sat forward, even when it was stormy, and I can conceive of few things more astonishing, at the same time overpowering to a sensitive person, than that of a night trip, when you cannot see an inch ahead, unless you are at the engineer's window, and you sit swaying about after the engine, (or machine as it is invariably called by the employees) which seems every moment as if it would fling itself off the track, as it continually sags and leans from one side to the other. In the passenger cars no idea whatever of the speed, or the momentum, can be obtained; this can only be got by standing near the track as the train whizzes by, or being upon the engine or tender. There is, in addition to the jerks and motion ahead, a universal compound hideous noise, made of steam fizzing, the shriek of the whistle, which never seems to be over on a fast train, as it is the custom to whistle at every crossing, and a general groaning of wheels, chains, and axles, and the sough of the wind as it draws through the engine. In fact, take a quiet man out of his parlor some stormy evening, with an easterly breeze, from a comfortable confab with his better half, and put him on the engine of a mail train, "devouring the darkness" at the rate of 45 miles an hour, and if he recovers from the shock in six months he will have considerably more iron in his nerves than most slow coaches I know.

But on the evening in question, we had fair weather, and daylight sufficient to last us a good way down, a first-rate engine, and a clear run to W——, so far as we knew.

"A fair prospect for a good trip," said I to the engineer, before starting.

"It looks well enough now," was his reply. "And little enough time to do it in. I only wish the merchants of B—— had to run these —— mail trains for themselves, and take the beggarly wages I get for the business. I'll be bound they would not scrape their precious bones over the road more than once, and then twenty miles an hour would take the breath out of their bodies."

Thompson, the engineer on this trip, I had ridden with before. He was a tall, black-haired man, from the State of Connecticut, a great driver, and silent as death on the road. He kept his eye fixed steadily on the track, except when he was timing his speed. That he possessed the unscrupulous presence of mind, some persons may call it recklessness, that is positively demanded by the incident that follows:—

We had come along very well, and were some way past N—— W——. I think we might have been going at the rate of thirty-five miles an hour, common running time. There was here a slight curve in the road, and on getting around it, I heard Thompson cry out at the utmost power of his lungs (not of much account to be sure in the din of the engine) "There is something on the road. Hold on for your lives." And as he said this, he put the whole force on the engine, and let off the full power of the whistle in a shrick of concentrated agony, that it appeared as if the entire chorus of pandemonium had been let loose, and then, in another second, there was a tremendous crash, a mighty jar that threw me flat on the floors of the engine, and a universal crashing of timbers, rattling of wheels, and something like the death-shriek of man or beast. And in another second all this agony was over, the engine was reversed, the brakes put on, and Thompson exclaimed, "We have run down a train, Mr. Collins, and though our time is short, I believe it is but a duty to run back and see if any one is killed." Thompson and I thereupon jumped off and ran back about twenty yards, when we saw in an instant the terrific danger we had past, and the nature of the accident. A party of Irish laborers were now standing by the side of the road, and the engineer of the train we had run down, a red-haired Lowland Scot, by the name of McGillies, told us how it had all happened. "You see, men," said Mac, "I had come along down to back up into the gravel pit, with about thirty men on board the dirt cars, and a car with two horses in it; I knew you would be along, and I believed I had time enough to set the switch, back off my train and put everything in order before you would be here. But as true as I live at this moment, I hadn't run down more than far enough to get my last car on to the gravel track, and as for the switch, I had not seen it, before I heard you. I believe I considered a second about it, and I said to myself, if this switch is set now, both trains will be altogether broke up; if I leave the train, my men will at least be safe, and he will have some chance of running over through it. 'Jump men—jump for your lives!' was all I said; and we did, and cleared ourselves, and that is just it; and 'what will the Governor be speaking about?' as the Irishman says. The nature of the ground was all that saved the mail train. A little plane on the one side had been cut down for the gravel, and the road lay sliding, while on the right hand an embankment went down a considerable distance, and in a small pond or pool at the bottom of this bank were the victims of our speed and Thomlison's presence of mind, namely, the locomotive, the dirt-cars and cars in which were the horses, the latter, of course, "kilt entirely." Our engine struck the hindermost of the dirt-cars with the most terrific force, and literally piled the whole train one over the other upon the engine, and the impetus still keeping up with a violent strain to the right, the locomotive, and in fact the whole concern, had gone over in one mass off the road and out of our way. "Come, Mr. Collins," cried Thompson, "we have not half a minute to lose; on board, on board!" and springing on the machine, we were again piling down the road at an awful rate to make up for lost time. On reaching the next station, we found that every thing moveable in the front of our engine had been carried clean away, our lamp, cow-killer, rails and woodwork, but the heavy solid engine-head had literally acted like a cannon ball, and swept the whole gravel train off the track as if it had been so many bundles of straw.

"You look pale, man," said Thompson, as we got down from the engine in the station-house at W——.

"I feel pale," said I. "By the way, it appears to me you raised steam when you saw the train ahead. "Did you know it was a train?"

"I cannot say much about that," he replied, with a strange look about his eyes. "The fact is, I knew there was something ahead, that we were going 35 miles an hour, and that to bring up was totally out of the question. The only chance was in running the thing down. I have played the same game before, and I should again if my life was hanging in it. You must do something, and you must do it short metre. But let me tell you one thing, Mr. Collins, it is the last day that ——— red-headed Scotchman will drive a train on the W—— road."

"What has happened, Charles?" asked my wife of me, as I entered the sitting-room of my house in W——, for I went no further than this place. "You look more like a ghost than a living man." Out of curiosity I looked in the glass, and it was literally the fact, that my cheeks were a ghastly white, my hair as wet as if it had just been ducked in the river; in fact, I was the exact picture of a criminal who is led out for execution.

"Happened, Mary!" was my reply, "this has happened that I have taken my last ride as special agent on a mail train, if the house must be sold over our heads." And then I detailed the above circumstances.

"Horrible, horrible!" exclaimed the poor girl, unable to keep the tears from flowing down her cheeks, "what an awful escape from death. Grant Heaven that you may never go again!"

I learned beyond a doubt, for I made every enquiry, that McGillies, the driver of the gravel train, was an intemperate man, and had been seen hanging about the grog shops of N—— W—— that afternoon. Rum was the cause of this near escape that I had from a horrible death; and I would say in conclusion, never on any occasion ride on special mail trains, and beware of strong drink as you would of a raging poison.—N. Y. Tribune.

A French discoverer has, at last alighted upon the world's bonne bouche of combination in woman—the blending of Spanish blood and Irish, that is found in the North of Ireland and (almost exclusively) among the higher classes and aristocracy of that country. We have elsewhere recorded, that, in all our travels, we had never seen such perfection of spirit, beauty, mien, manner and captivation, belonging to a class, as in the black-haired, dark-eyed, tall and brilliant-complexioned women of this blood.—It sprang from the large Spanish emigration to the North of Ireland, a century or more ago, but it has descended in apparently improving graduation and intermingling. A French writer, giving an account to a Paris newspaper, of his visit to Ireland during the late Fair and Industrial Exhibition, digresses to say:—

"Ireland was anciently called an 'Island of saints and pretty women.' As for the saints, when I find one I shall record the fact, if it were only for its rarity; but, for the beauty of its women, it has not only maintained, but increased its reputation."—After eulogizing the freshness of their colour, the rare purity of their skin, the rich abundance of their brown hair, and the mysterious depth of their soft grey eyes, he goes on, with characteristic modesty of his country to say:—"If we dare compare them, we would say that the Irish resemble the French more than the English. In regularity of features and purity of outline they are excelled, possibly by the hot-house blossoms of English aristocracy, where severe statuesque beauty is hereditary. The vivacity, the expression, the nobility of Irish features are the very reverse of this cold, calm, Saxon distinction.—Less beautiful than English beauty, in the artistic sense, Irish beauty is immensely more attractive. We are not unfrequently surprised by the antique perfection of the faces in Ireland, but we find ourselves far oftener saying, "What a pretty girl! what a charming woman!' In short, they strike us less, and please us far more. We would not choose them so soon as models for the engravings of an annual; but we would prefer to talk to them—to live in their society. We would be more apt to love than admire them. And now comes the very highest compliment a Frenchman could pay:—"Irish women recall the French, especially by the elegance and good taste of their toilette, by the ease and flexibility of their movements, and the gracious, frank cordiality of their manner. Many a time, during the first days of our stay in Dublin, seeing a lively group of women passing through one of the galleries of the Exhibition, we have been tempted to believe in an illusion, and have felt surprised and disappointed to hear, flowing from their arch lips, the guttural English tones instead of the soft jargon of the Parisians. To finish this resemblance in one word, Irish women possess the secret of feminine grace. They know how to walk: do not laugh: it is a serious matter. A French woman can walk—so can an Italian. A Spaniard excels in this eminently feminine art—sometimes she even exagerates it. We will not push our want of gallantry so far as to say that there are female nationalities of which their walk is their stigma. He who has ever seen, in the streets of London, a woman, of middle height, walk beside a horse guard of six feet, and keep step with him, has no need of our rhetoric to convince him On this subject, we suppose, we must accept, as satisfactory, a mot of a cultivated English woman, who had travelled so much in France, and in the south of Europe, that she had almost lost her distinctive nationality—'You deceive yourselves, gentlemen,' she said, in reply to remarks similar to ours, made in society; 'they are not quite so ignorant of walking in England as you fancy. Only the women who do not know how, never walk there—they always go abroad in a carriage!"

Hidden Treasure.—A person in England lately rummaging among his family documents, found written on the back of an old deed some words indicating that a pot of gold was buried in a certain place in the garden. It was at first regarded as a hoax, but on digging in the spot an iron pot came to light, containing fifteen thousand guineas, and a scrap of parchment much decayed, on which was written, "The devil shall have it sooner than Cromwell."

Extra Supper Soup.

A young acquaintance of ours who puts up at a $2 and 50c. boarding house, relates the following incident, which may afford a useful hint to those ladies who undertake to provide nutriment for boarders with strong stomachs and weak purses.

One day last week, says our friend, the soup produced for the noon-tide meal, was uncommonly rich and unctious, possessing a flavour which proved very conclusively that an extra quantity of meat had been used in its preparation. The boarders were all very much surprised and delighted, but the landlady seemed to be less pleased by their frequent draughts on the tureen.—A short time after dinner our friend happened to pass by the kitchen and overheard the hostess rating her cook for putting too much of the shin of beef in the soup kettle. "Half of it, (said the economical provider) would have been enough for eight boarders that pays no more than they does for their vittles."

"I didn't put half the shin in, ma'am," said the cook.

"You needn't tell me that story," cried the excited old lady: "I know you have been wasting the meat, so just take the ladle and dip up the bones, and we'll see whether you're a liar or I'm mistaken."

The cook obeyed, and after diving the ladle two or three times into the kettle, she brought up something that explained the mystery.

"Lor, ma'm, I see how it is," said she, "the kitten has been jumpin' about the kettle and dropped into it, and it's all boiled up in the broth."

"Bless me!" cried the hostess, "sure enough it is," then after a considerable pause she added: "Cook, have we any more kittens? We might drop in one you know, every time we have a soup dinner. You wouldn't believe how the boarders seemed to like it."

Our friend paused to hear no more, but started to seek another boarding house. —Philadelphia Mercury.

The Boy whom Nobody Wanted.

Reuben Ramsey came into the house one day, roaring with all his might. It was no uncommon thing to see Reuben in this condition; so nobody became greatly concerned to find out the matter. This is always very provoking to young gentlemen who undertake to make a noise in the world, and so it proved to Reuben Ramsey. The more folks would not hear, the louder he roared, until his grandfather dropped his newspaper, and exclaimed, 'What now, what now, my boy.'

'They—they—they don't want me?' cried Reuben.

'Who don't want you?' said grandfather, looking at him through his glasses.

'The boys!' screamed Reuben; 'they won't let me play; they call me a cross little rascal, and tell me to go home.'

'Not much out of the way, either,' murmured grandfather, as he took up his paper again. 'Nobody's to blame for not wanting you. Go look into the glass, boy, and see if you want yourself.'

'Want myself?' thought Reuben, as he stopped crying, and sat down; 'that is queer. What if I don't, how is it to be helped? I can't say, as the boys do, 'there is that cross Reuben Ramsey; nobody wants you, Reuben; so you had better be off home.' And yet I don't know but I would say so if it would do any good. I will look in the glass and see if I want myself.'

So Reuben posted into the drawing-room, where there was a long mirror, in which he could see himself from top to toe. What a sight was here! A face covered with all manner of dark lines, made of tears which had been turned out of their course by dirty hands; eyes that were dark and clear enough when they were made, but which now looked like two radishes in a glass of muddy water; a nose that might have gone for another radish, only that it was pinched out of all shape; and a mouth that looked as though it had never opened except to scream. Added to this, was hair standing on end, torn jacket, and muddy trowsers. Reuben looked at this ugly fellow in the glass, and did not wonder that he was not wanted.

'I am sure,' thought he, 'be it Reuben Ramsey or not, I don't want him.' But then the thought came back to him again, 'It can't be helped; that is myself; it will do no good to say, 'Go away you cross little rascal;' it won't go.

So Reuben sat down upon the chair, and covered his face with his dirty hands, and cried as though his heart would break. He did not roar and scream; but sobbed and sobbed, until his heart came swelling up, and he was well nigh choked.

Reuben knew he was not beloved, and his good mother had often told him why; but Reuben, like most wicked people, thought the blame belonged to others. He thought that his relatives ought to love him, and if they did not they were cruel and wicked. Reuben did not stop to think even that the great God does not love what is unlovely, and of course does not require it of others.

'I am a very unhappy boy,' Reuben would say to himself; 'nobody wants me. The teacher don't want me at school; the boys don't want me to play with them on the green; father don't want me in the store; grandfather don't want in me the library; Frank and Helen don't want me anywhere; mother don't want me in the nursery, because I scare the baby—the baby cries when he sees me; Becky don't want me in kitchen; and Tom says that the horses kick the minute that I go into the stable.

So thought Reuben, day after day; and even in the night would the poor boy wake up with the bitter words on his tongue, 'Nobody wants me—nobody wants me;' but never, till the day in which he looked in the looking-glass, had he made the curious discovery that he did not want himself.

The Religion of the Russians.

Public attention being very particularly directed towards the Russian nation at the present time, a few remarks regarding some peculiarities in their manner of worship, &c., which probably are not generally known, may be interesting.

Whenever a Russian passes a church, his custom is to cross himself, (some do so three times, accompanying it with bowings.) In every room in their houses an image or picture is placed in the east corner, before which they uncover their heads and cross themselves on entering.

The churches are filled with these their representatives of the deity, and it is very curious to see a devout Russian kissing the toe of one, crossing himself before another, while to another, he will in addition prostrate himself, even with head to the ground; the latter is also very frequently done at intervals during the celebration of their services; but their churches are always open, so that if any one wants to pay devotion to any particular image or picture while no service is going on, he can do so.

The Russians also believe in relics, in their efficacy in healing diseases, working other miracles, &c. Notwithstanding this, a very short time ago, a new relic was found in the south of Russia, and a courier being immediately dispatched with it to the Emperor at St. Petersburg; on his arrival, his Imperial Majesty (expecting some important news regarding his operations in Turkey, when told his errand, exclaimed, "Away with the relic! it is time to put an end to such nonsense." Would this were to be carried out. But their superstitions seem too deeply rooted to be done away with in a short time.

Future Housekeepers.—We sometimes catch ourselves wondering how many of the young ladies whom we meet with, are to perform the part of housekeepers, when the young men who now eye them so admiringly have persuaded them to become their wives. We listen to those young ladies of whom we speak, and hear them not only acknowledging, but boasting of their ignorance of all household duties, as if nothing could so lower them in the esteem of their friends as a confession of an ability to bake bread and pies, or cook a piece of meat, or a disposition to engage in any useful employment. Speaking from our own youthful recollection, we are free to say that taper fingers and lily-white hands are very pretty to look at with a young man's eyes, and sometimes we have known the artless innocence of practical knowledge displayed by a young miss to become rather interesting than otherwise. But we have lived long enough to learn that life is full of rugged experiences, and that the most loving, romantic and delicate people must live on cooked or otherwise prepared food, and in homes kept clean and tidy by industrious hands. And for all practical purposes of married life, it is generally found that for the husband to sit and gaze at his wife's taper fingers and lily hands, or for a wife to sit and be looked at and admired, does not make the pot boil or put the smallest piece of food in the pot.

COLONIAL MISSIONS.

On Sunday, the Rev. S. R. Ward, a man of color, and a congregationalist minister from Upper Canada, preached two sermons, one in the morning, in Horton Lane Chapel; the other in the evening, in College Chapel.

On Monday evening, a meeting was held in Salem Chapel, to enforce the claims of the Colonial Missionary Society upon the Christian public. At this meeting, Mr. W. E. Glyde presided, opening its proceedings with a short address. After singing and prayer, the Rev. S. R. Ward delivered an address, of which the following were the principal features. The rev. gentleman, alluding to the Colonial Missionary Society, said that he came to speak of it chiefly as to its workings in Canada, not because he assumed that that country was the principal scene of its labors, but because it was the scene with which he was best acquainted. The population of Canada would be about one million; half of these would be native-born Canadians, the other half would consist of a mixed population, the greater portion of which would be from the United Kingdom. There were also included in the above numbers, fifty thousand Indians and forty thousand Negroes. Now it was amongstthe kith and kin of the people of the British Islands that the Missionary Society, whose interests he was advocating, sought to spread the truth of the gospel, the gospel with its relief for the moral woes of our natute; the gospel whose free development in England, had formed the basis of this country's greatness. The rev. speaker then, in a humorous manner, went on to say that the people of Yorkshire had the reputation of being a shrewd calculating people, with plenty of shillings amongst them, but with a great objection to spending them, except when they knew they were spending them in a proper manner; and, therefore, when he came amongst them to obtain money from them, he deemed it necessary to show them that there was both need and reason for their gifts. In October, 1851, for reasons which he needed not to explain, he had found himself under the necessity of leaving the United States, and going to Canada. After that, as agent for the Anti-Slavery Association, he had travelled over the whole of Upper Canada, visited all the congregational churches there, with the exception of four; seen all their ministers, and found them all to be friends of the poor slave. But this was apart from the question; and turning to it he said, that these visits had furnished him with abundant proof, that the congregational churches of Upper Canada were worthy of every sympathy, prayerful and pecuniary, of English Christians. In the first place, because they were our own kith and kin. Then they had to contend with many difficulties. In Canada, before a meeting like the one before him could be brought together, they who composed it would have to walk or ride some four or five miles over roads, according to the rev. gentleman's description, were almost as bad as no roads. Yet these people had many of them come from England, and when here, they had every convenience for public worship close at hand, and of course the wants they were subject to were much felt. He himself could speak of this, for he had grown up in New York, and the change had been grievous to him. Then the way in which congregational churches were formed. Some few men holding the principles of Independency, lived some 5 or 6 miles from each other. For a long time they lived without any religious communication or fellowship. By and bye each learned his neighbor's profession, then they met; talked with each other; organized a little church, which soon would number some twenty-five members. Now, they would obtain an occasional preacher to visit them, but mostly they had to learn by Sunday school teaching to teach themselves, for they were too poor to maintain a minister; indeed nearly all the Canadian Independent Churches were too poor for this, for out of sixty there were but six who could do it. It was true that their church at Toronto maintained its own minister, and gave £100 a year to the missions. It was true that even the poorest church amongst them was trained in habits of liberality towards missions, and that, on an average, every one of their members gave to missionary objects 4s. 6d. per annum, while in England, the average was only 1¾d. per head, or perhaps this year, when more liberality had been exercised, 2d. or 2½d. The rev. gentleman then spoke of Canadian congregational preachers, saying that those who were brought up to take their place amongst that body were invariably young men of fervent piety, great zeal, and sound education, equal in this latter point to ministers at home. With respect to their piety and zeal, they had need of these qualifications, for they were educated side by side with those who were intended for legal, medical, and mercantile professions, in every one of which success—wealth, was certain. Yet these things did not tempt these young men; they knew them, but at the same time they could give them up—give them up for a toilsome life in the ministry, with the prospect at best of emoluments varying from £35 to £70 per annum, 16s. to the pound. Then again, in Canada, they were not in the habit of encouraging people to build chapels before they could be paid for; indeed, many of them would not join in opening a chapel, while a debt was hanging over it. On this subject, the speaker told some anecdotes that well illustrated the zeal and industry which the congregational churches in Canada brought to bear in erecting places suitable for the decent worship of God; and, on account of their zeal in this and all things; the efforts they made to help themselves, yet which were not sufficient for their help; he appealed to their brethren and friends in England to assist them somewhat if they could. The rev. gentleman then said, that the labors of the congregational churches of Canada were eminently successful. In September, 1852, he had visited a pastor of a district church, and had found that man in the greatest depression from family misfortune, and the gloom which hung over the interests of the religion he preached. In 1853, he had paid that man another visit, and had found all things changed. The spirit of God had been with him in the ministry. fifty-five persons had joined his church, and before he (the speaker) left, 75 had joined. It was thus all over; they made no great noise, but the religion they preached was spreading through the country. At one place where the speaker had found himself last year, a revival had taken place, nineteen had become members of the church, eight more followed them, and the last account stated that 500 had been converted to God. Perhaps when they heard these things Englishmen would help them, and perhaps not; but at any rate God would. Mr. Ward gave a deeply interesting account of the missions to the Indians and Negroes, and especially of the self-denying labors of Mr. Raven, "a man of great piety, zeal, liberality, and energy," at Colpoy's Bay. Then, the poor Negroes who had escaped from the States had to be taught the principles of that religion, which in the States they heard so little of, and the slaveocrats had to be shown what men those could be whom they had degraded. The speaker here made another eloquent appeal in favor of the missions he represented, and resumed his seat.

The collection was then made, after which Mr. W. E Glyde made a few observations, the Rev. S. R. Ward offered a short prayer, and the proceedings terminated.

The Opening of Japan.

From the Correspondence of the New York Herald.

HONG KONG, April 11, 1854.

The charm is broken, and the mystery which for so many centuries has hung over these falbed realms, has been penetrated, if not dispelled, by American enterprise and American curiosity. The prayers of the faithful throughout the world, that this "land of martyrs"—is not the prayers of those martyrs themselves, whose spirits hover over their former abodes—have been heard, and henceforth we may regard Japan as among the families of the earth. It is sufficient to know that concessions have been made, and that intimations have been given that the same concessions will be made to other nations peacebly demanding them. To America it may justly be a subject of pride that she has introduced her elder sister Japan to the society of nations.

I send you here an extra from the office of the Friend of China, containing the movements of the squadron until the sailing of the Susquehanna, a few days before the signing of the treaty. That treaty was to have been signed on the 29th of March. It is probable that this may arrive before Captain Adams, who has been despatched, via San Francisco, to Washington, and who, besides official occurrences, will be able to furnish a detailed account of the circumstances connected with the interviews which took place. I will add some particulars, however, not mentioned in the "extra" alluded to, and which I have had it in my power to collect from most reliable sources. One of the first ports offered he stated to be some seventy miles south of Jeddo. The vessels sent to survey that port found it to be a good one, but the bar at the mouth was too shallow to permit its being accepted. Commodore Perry refused to have anything to do with Nangasaki. Time honored restrictions and contempt for foreigners are so identified with that harbour and town that it was judged inexpedient to make it even a depot for coals. It was thought better to commence with some port where foreigners were not known. The Japanese disclaimed all sovereignty over the Loo Choo Islands; and therefore our apparent occupancy of a foothold there was not considered in the treaty.

Commodore Perry is to stipulate for three ports, of which it is stated, he will insist that Jeddo shall be one. Matsmai has been agreed on as another, and probably Sha-dimai will be the third. Of all these ports accurate surveys will be made, or, rather, have been made. The Japanese negotiators wished, on the plea of preparations necessary for these ports. Commodore Perry replied that no preparations were necessary; all that was wanted was the permission to trade and refit at these ports. An abundance of coal has been promised. It is confidentially asserted that the chief men among the Japanese expressed themselves to the effect that the time had now arrived when it was required for Japan to change her policy in regard to intercourse with foreigners, and to act like other nations in that respect.

It is not a little curious that so much ignorance has existed in regard to Japan.—The question has been often asked what a fleet could accomplish towards bringing to terms a people numbering some fifty millions. The answer is that Japan is entirely at the mercy of a maritime nation—1st, because the people of that country are now subsisting on a minimum, and depend for this subsistence on their coast trade, which is immense, and a destruction or interruption of this coast trade brings famine and desolation throughout the land; 2nd, an immense number of the population reside on the seashore, in villages and cities. I need only mention Nangasaki, Matsmai, Ozaca and Jeddo; the latter of which, if not the largest city in the world, probably contains more inhabitants than any other. In view of these facts, no doubt, the Japanese have been brought to treat. Now that the truth on this score has been tested, there is no knowing to what extent the concessions will be made and granted.

The Japanese are intimidated. They had the air of people who had for a long while anticipated a hostile visit, and had wearied in watching for it. The very length of time which the expedition has threatened them has been in favour of its success.

The first question asked, was as usual, on the subject of religion. Perhaps this may now be only a form, which their ancestors have handed down. I regret that I am not able to inform you with much circumstantiality of what took place on that head. Commodore Perry is said to have informed them, however, that in his country all religions were free, and that he did not come to treat on that subject. I believe he even advised them to adopt the same policy.—Protection is to be afforded to our shipwrecked seamen, and coal for our steamers. The treaty will be made out in English, Dutch and Japanese. Some months will elapse before all the negotiations are ratified. In the meantime something interesting may be looked for from this quarter, either from the movements of our own fleet, or from the action which the French and English will take, if they do not find themselves already sufficiently occupied.

It may be gratifying to our readers to be informed of some of the incidents of the by-play, as it were, which attended the negotiations. The Japanese being exceedingly artful and punctilious, you may be certain that it required no little dexterity and firmness to deal successfully with them.

At the former visit last year the fleet anchored at Uraga—on this occasion they anchored nearer Jeddo. To this the commissioners remonstrated, saying that Uraga had been the place agreed on. In the meantime the boats were sounding every day, and after receiving the reports as to the depth of water, the vessels would be moved up higher towards Jeddo. To this sounding the Japanese objected, of course; but when they found the Americans advanced steadily, they stipulated to hold the negotiations at a point half way between Uraga and the American anchorage. An officer sent to examine that spot found it a fishing village, totally inappropriate for the purpose. The Japanese were obliged to yield, as Perry threatened to hold the interview in Jeddo itself. Of that interview you will read in the extra enclosed. During its continuance, however, the suite of the Commodore were entertained by at least, what they represent as being to them a most unsavory [illegible] worms, dicta [illegible] for politeness' sake.

The houses (not more than two stories high, probably on account of the earthquakes) have no signs of that superfluousness of wealth and pomp with which the high functionaries of Japan are said to surround themselves. They had soldiers ranged in a line to the council house. These were armed with an old-fashioned firelock—a cover being thrown over the breech—with cross bows and with spears, inlaid with mother-of-pearl. Their aspect was stated to be extremely unwarlike, and poorly calculated to inspire terror into the hearts of a valorous enemy. It is even a matter of surprise that the Japanese can be considered as a warlike nation. The books which have been written on them, on this subject, and on many others, as far as such limited experience can be trusted, are extremely defective and erroneous. Their cannons are not more than twelve-pounders, and nothing astonished them more than the size of the guns on board of the steamers—frequently taking off their hats and inserting their heads, as if to test practically the truth of what they saw. A friend entertains so little opinion of their prowess, that he assures me he would not be afraid to enter Jeddo with a boat's crew.

Jeddo, as seen from the vessels, does not present that imposing appearance some says it does. Though, as I have said, it is the most populous city in the world, there was no reason to believe it possesses any splendid buildings; at any rate, not any very towering edifices—no spires, no beaming minarets, like the romantic cities of the East. It was remarked that in visiting the Susquehanna, an officer of Japanese artillery went at once to the mast head, may be to see Jeddo, or to make professional observations.

As usual, on the arrival of the American fleet, a cordon of boats was placed around it. The commander took out his watch, and pointed to the boats, indicating that they must be removed in five minutes. It is unnecessary to state that this very forcible hint was understood, and the boats were removed In insisting upon these small points, and by keeping aloof himself, (only being seen twice during the negotiations), Commodore Perry manifested very great discretion, and operated more effectually than he could have done by any other line of conduct. It seems that the invariable mode of proceeding heretofore with the Japanese, has been to impose an indignity upon foreign officials, and contempt has always been consequent thereon. They were not allowed to display either on this visit. They were met by persons as studiously punctilious as themselves, and determined to yield not the smallest point.

The lower orders were very kind to the visitors, and manifested no small satisfaction at the aspect affairs seem to be assuming. It is certain that the exclusive system Japan has hitherto adopted, has not been in accordance with the wishes of the great body of the inhabitants. All writers agree on this subject, and the experience of this visit proves it.

The obsequiousness of the lower orders to their superiors is excessively revolting, to say the least of it.

They would approach, almost on all fours, bowed to the earth. At one of the interviews, they were approaching Perry in this manner—it was on board ship—but "old Bruin," as we used to call him, ordered them to stand up like men. "He would have none of that."

Astonishment at the railroad and telegraph overcame all other feelings. Placed in a circle, the railroad worked beautifully, and only after the American officers got in and went flying around, drawn by the small engine, would they essay it. Infinite was their surprise at finding themselves whirled through the air with such velocity. "The Dutch have shown us none of these things," was their observation.

The Japanese would not believe the telegraph at first. They gave it a very severe test. For instance, placing a Japanese at either extremity, they would converse on improbable subjects, and not connectedly, suspecting some imposition. For example—it was a beautiful day; and the man stationed at one end directed the operator to say to the person stationed at the other end that it was raining. The Japanese word was Ankeised, and the sound reproduced by the further operator to his attendant. Great was their wonder, on comparing notes, to find that the telegraph had conveyed their messages correctly. Wires have been ordered, and the intention expressed to extend this line at once to some place remote from Jeddo. They have the means of making wire and all the apparatus. They certainly have clocks; for a number of these being among the presents, and one of them being out of order, was being adjusted by an engineer on board one of the steamers.—"Give yourself no trouble," signified to him one of the Japanese; "I will send it to the clock-maker in Jeddo, who will repair it."

They are not so unacquainted with outside affairs as may be imagined; nor are they unacquainted with the duties resulting from our contiguity to them. For instance, they asked if the railroad had been finished to the Mississippi from California.

In relation to the social habits of these people the most favorable accounts are given. Your friend Captain Buchanan gave an entertainment to a few of the chief men, or to one of the chiefs, requesting that a few friends be brought. The result was that eighty or one hundred persons came. Room was made on the spacious deck, and things went on merrily. The extract from rice is now the only liquor known in Japan. It is called saki by them. Hence they gave the name "American saki," to all the drinks. They are fond of ardent spirits. The guests made it a business to taste of every wine and of every dish. Inside of their long robes, kept together by a belt around the waist, they carry a roll of paper, used as a pocket handkerchief—a small piece at a time.—They use this paper also at feasts to wrap up small pieces of each dish, making a note at the same time in regard to it. This is considered a very high compliment. You may imagine that at an American dinner they would fill themselves with some not very palatable viands. As in duty bound, on the occasion referred to each of the guests referred to helped himself to a wine-glass of sweet oil, which he was obliged to disgorge at once, of course. He made a note, as usual of the drink. Some one was curious to know what he had written. It was—"This is the worst wine they have got."

They waited after they were helped, and followed the example of the Americans. All that has been said of their politeness is true. It would be difficult to find a people excelling them in that respect.

When well enlivened by the saki, they would permit their swords to be examined, as in them one side. On one of those occasions the quality of the steel was tested [illegible]

Japanese scimeter yielded, showing that what has been said of the superiority of their metal is not entirely true.

The engine room was the principal point of attraction on board of the steamers.—They never ceased to wonder at the immense display of iron, all for use and in constant application. It is no matter of surprise that the Japanese were struck with the symmetry and magnificence of the vessels, when men who have been at sea for yeas, on first visiting one of these majestic vessels, experience a sensation of admiration and astonishment.

They asked Commodore Perry if any more ships were coming. Perry told them yes; but if they would promise to treat, he would order a vessel to go and detain the others. The promise being given, he was enabled to send away the Susquehanna to attend Mr. Commissioner McLane, who goes to Canton in her. By this means we are in receipt of news from Japan.

Thousands are ready to avail themselves of the opportunity of commerce with this country, and no doubt we shall soon know what is in most demand. I leave it to political economists to calculate what will be the effect of opening a market of fifty millions of people to people who are as ready for trade as the Americans and English, and many other nations. We regard not this great event in that point of view. In the meantime, however, it may be stated that glass-ware is in demand there, as recent experience demonstrates, as well as mercury, yellow amber, and a variety of articles of a small kind, which traders only can discover.

I fear to tire you, so I will not prolong this epistle.

One would suppose in reading of Japan, that it was cultivated everywhere. This was not the case near Jeddo. On the contrary, the prospect on land strongly resembled some parts of the shore near the Chesapeake.—The houses were not very remarkable for cleanliness.

N. B.—An officer walked within a few miles of Jeddo, unharmed, and was only brought back by an order from the Commodore, sent on horseback.

Death of Josiah Holbrook.

It was with a deep pang that we read yesterday in the Lynchburg Virginian the subjoined paragraph. The excellent man whose death it announces was well known in this city, which was for several years the theatre of his indefatigable and valuable labours, and never did any one acquire from all a more affectionate esteem. Every thought of his soul, and almost every hour of his life were devoted to the advancement in knowledge, and goodness, and usefulness of his fellow-creatures, and especially the young.

"PAINFUL OCCURRENCE.—Yesterday afternoon the lifeless body of Josiah Holbrook, of Washington, D. C., was found in Black Water creek, near the mouth of the Tunnel. Mr. H. had been staying in this city for several months, occupied in scientific, and especially in geological pursuits, to which he was enthusiastically devoted. The fruits of his studies and investigations were from time to time communicated to the public through the columns of the Virginian. His great object—a really great and philanthropic one—was to simplify the science to the capacity of youthful minds, and interest them in its prosecution by practical and pleasant experiments and modes of study. It is supposed that he met his death by falling down a cliff into the creek while searching for geological specimens. He had been absent from his boarding house since Saturday morning.—Mr. H. had written and published much on scientific subjects, and had achieved an extended reputation. The tidings of his sad and sudden death will shock a numerous circle of acquaintances and friends in Washington who esteemed him very highly.

Mr. Holbrook was, as our readers will remember, the author of several series of familiar articles published in the Intelligencer on agriculture, chemistry, mineralogy, &c."

A Case of Kidnapping.

The Tribune brings to light another example of that system of kidnapping by which coloured persons born in free States are always liable to be carried off into Slavery. The facts are related by that paper as follows:

Some twelve or fifteen years since, a resident of Monmouth County, N. J., by some means came in possession of a negro boy, aged about twelve years, whom he sent to school a short time, and whose affection and confidence he won by affected kindness. At length he suggested to the boy that he had better learn a trade, and recommended him to the proprietor of a bakery in the neighborhood, to whom the boy was bound. Thus matters went on, until the keeper of the establishment concluded to remove to Louisiana, when the boy was notified that he must go likewise, and informed for the first time that he was not his own master; that he had been bought, the sum of $600 having been paid for him. Accordingly, he was taken to Louisiana, where he has since remained and now lives. A gentleman residing in New Jersey, who is engaged in navigation, and runs a vessels to Louisiana, while lying at one of the public wharves in that State last winter, was accosted by an intelligent negro man, who desired to know if his vessel did not hail from New Jersey. The captain replied in the affirmative. The negro said he judged so from the appearance of the vessel. The captain then asked the man what he knew about New Jersey. The negro replied that he was taken from that State and sold into Slavery, informing him who did it, at the same time giving him the names of all the principal inhabitants in the town whence he was sold, telling him also where he attended school, &c. The captain being acquainted with the place, knew his statements were correct, and promised to use his influence to secure to him his liberty.

Such is the statement we have received from a gentleman who vouches for its entire accuracy. The negro boy has now grown up to manhood, and is said to possess more than ordinary intelligence. His master asks $2,000 for him. It is further stated that the brute who kidnapped and sold him is still a resident of New Jersey, living somewhere in Burlington County. The wretch should be looked up.

It may be well enough to look up the kidnapper, but it strikes us the first thing to be done is to procure the release of his victim. This might be done, probably, through the interposition of the Governor of New Jersey, if the facts authenticated, were laid before him.—Anti-Slavery Standard.

The Circular Calling upon Fugitives from Canada for West India Labours.

This "curious" paper, handed us by a gentleman of this city, should, we think, be read with attention, by at least, one portion of our readers—the "fugitives of America." Nay more, we hope there will be a general expression of opinion, through the columns of this paper, on the merits of the scheme: First,—that the world and the rest of mankind, Jamaica planters included, may know whether or not the hardy and industrious men and women, just settled in this free country, with its temperate climate and cheap lands, as low as 7s. 6d. c'y per acre, in Upper Canada, in good position, and 1s. in less favored locations, will countenance this new March or May-day scheme, of move—move, for the benefit of some absentee proprietors; or to buy up the cheap lands of Jamaica at £1 per acre, when it is admitted that the lands here at 7s. 6d. are quite as high as those who would go to Jamaica at some one's expense, are willing to pay now. The whole plan, to our mind, involves an absurdity so glaring, that we very much doubt if any gentleman would attempt to make such proposals to any but the supposed stupid fugitives of Canada, and the coolies of the East. We glory in the prosperity of all the various sections of this vast empire, Jamaica included, but "our private opinion freely expressed," is, that any scheme proposed or to be gotten up, for the advantage of one part, as Jamaica, for instance, to the detriment of another, or for the benefit of the inhabitants of another, should be emphatically condemned. We are in favor of emigration—the emigration of fugitives, and the free people from the despotism south of us, to this country; and, although we know full well that the slaves cannot all come here, we wish they could—and although we know that the free colored people will not all come, we wish they would, we know it is not impossible, as anti-emigrationists of the State assert; and we believe that were they to determine to do so, such a rebuke would be given to slaveholders, and such an addition of strength would be made, by the many hundreds of thousands who would find ample room here, as would make slavery lower its brazen head. We hail every arrival of the industrious colored man, whether fugitive or free born with unspeakable satisfaction—yes, and the lazy man too, if slavery has made him so, as we believe that circumstances and the "elements" combine to make him active here, and the presence of working bees will inspire him to go on; but after his life of trouble, anxiety, and doubt, from fear of the auction block, in the south, or the ever-changing sentiments north, we think he should "locate," especially as it is conceded that no where in the world, not even in the golden fields of Australia or California, can the poor man reap a better harvest, or the rich man feel more secure in his possessions; nor in old England herself can he be freer. Now, were we to beg, entreat, and persuade the fugitives, for they seem to be the ones appealed to, or, as we give this nameless writer a hearing, were we to pass the matter over in silence, we would clearly fall short of our duty; in either case, we would be encouraging directly, or indirectly, a dictation to colored Canadians, to which we know them to be opposed. The Leadership idea is unfortunately for our brethren of the States, in full tide of bad success, not that they see it, or at least do admit it; but they will one day—then they will discard it; here it is not fashionable. Colored Canadians have outlived it. They accept they tell us, views that comport with their sense of right and justice, as developed by British freedom, and they will follow no man or set of persons who will go out of the true line.

The writer of the circular, has no other idea than that they are, and will be in leading strings for a long time yet—in that he shows his ignorance of them. He asks very significantly, if they can do as much for themselves where they are, as they "could in Jamaica." If their cheap Jamaica land is £1 per acre, we have shown that they can do better here, and the women and children will not, and do not, have to work in the hot sun on their four or five acres, while the men hire around on "neighboring plantations," or farms. They are not liable to the diseases that do affect laboring people, when living in a tropical climate, where they cannot have the comforts of the rich,—do not live in a land in which they are "enslaved, and treated as an inferior and incapable race." This last, is a reflection on Canada and Canadians, that even the little prejudice and contempt we do have to combat once in awhile, will not justify. They are on British soil too, and the "constitutions" of the thousands (?) of cotton growers from the Southern States, endure the change amazingly. Professor Stowe may be quite right with his free labor views, so may "B——" be with his, but we think that other arguments will have to be adduced, before five thousand "fugitive" slaves will consent to be taken at other people's expense to Jamaica, or any other tropical country, though a part of Her Majesty's glorious dominions, for the opportunity to buy lands at £1 per acre, and contribute to further and perpetuate the peasant class, when they can grow up to the full stature of independent yeomen and what not, in this country. Were they to conclude to go, and did they desire a leader, they would, we verily believe, select Mr. Ward, as the man, but from many written expressions of his to men in Canada, as to the importance of this home for black men, we have no fear that he will "head" five thousand, or fifty, so we venture that "B——" is sanguine. Mr. Ward and probably other colored men in Canada may have private interests in Jamaica; why should they not, but fugitives have heard before no doubt of West India schemes equally alluring, which were not verified by the stern realities of West India field and other servant life. We repeat that Jamaica is part of the empire, and if colored men of enterprise have the means, let them buy where they will, but to make dazzling (?) offers to a people who have not more than a "start" in business here—to draw pictures and present to those who it is thought know no better, because men in Jamaica want lands cultivated, and men in England and elsewhere want this Continent for the "white races" alone, is not what we may pass by in silence, though free cotton, &c., are items in the bill.

We have no patience with the race of schemers who seem intent upon the negro's destruction. Hardly does he get clear from the fangs of American blood-hounds, when up comes the order to go back in the line of his former habitation. A great African nationality is held up before him,—a grand field in which these acknowledged refugees from the worst of oppressions, is to become princes and kings, may be. Though surrounded by those of his class whose heads are whitened with the frosts of many years—he learns that a hot climate would suit his and their constitution much better. That this is but a temporary resting-place for him, but must eventually be settled by younger sons of England's noble and gentlefolks. Or the great Continent of Africa can only be redeemed from barbarism, by her native sons in Canada, and other parts of America—so a training must be undergone for that purpose. Native Africans in Canada! Five thousand cotton-growers in Canada to go to Jamaica without means, and buy land at £1 per acre! Two absurdities to our minds. But speak out fugitives for yourselves. *

THE BRITISH WEST INDIES, AND FUGITIVE SLAVES FROM AMERICA.

(Copy:—The original will be shown to any person who may apply as under)

The paper on which these suggestions are printed is made of the leaves and stalk of the plantain tree, which is grown in all the West Indian Colonies, for the fruit. Humboldt states that one acre of good land in the tropics, planted therewith, will yield as much nutritious food as 144 acres of wheat. Mr. A. D. G. Netscher, an extensive proprietor in British Guiana, and a spirited member of the Legislature there, states, that the cost of keeping up a plantain estate in that colony, would be thirty dollars, or about £6 per acre; and that if grown, and cut down every eight months for the stem alone, the produce would be 1,400 to 1,500 good stems every cutting, or 4,500 in two years, and that the average quantity of fibre of each stem may be taken at 4-lbs. An acre of land will thus produce 9,000-lbs. of fibre per annum, at the cost of £6, and if £4 be added for the expense of drying, carrying, and preparing for a market, the cost need not much exceed a farthing a pound.

If the plantain trees are cultivated for food and allowed to stand in the ground until the fruit is sufficiently full to gather, they must have more space and time, and then the quantity of fibre will not be so large. If 300 trees be allowed to stand on an acre, the first year will give 300 bunches and 300 stalks. The next 900. The 300 bunches of fruit will be worth at least £12 sterling; the 300 stalks will each give 4 lbs., fibre, worth say 1d. per pound, (when merely dried and packed) that will be £5. But there will be raised on the same acre of land, along with the first crop of plantains, a crop of beans, of yams, and of corn, worth together at the very least £25; so that the first year's produce will yield £42, and the second and succeeding years, when the plantains will cover and therefore shade the ground, and there will be no room for other crops, the produce will be repeated every three months, and the fruit will be worth at the same rate £36, and the fibre £15. If a whole family is employed planting two acres of land, it may be kept in perfect order by the wife and children, leaving the man at liberty after his first planting either to extend the cultivation, to plant and cultivate canes, or to work for hire, on a neighboring plantation.

On the mountain lands at Montpelier, in Jamaica, the beautiful estate of Lord Howard-de Walden, Her Majesty's Minister in Belgium, seven tons of Yams, together with other vegetables, have been produced on an acre of land. At only £6 per ton, these would give £42 for a crop, which comes to perfection in six months. Tobacco, corn, plantains, and sugar-cane grow most luxuriantly on this estate, whilst it abounds with oranges, shaddocks, limes and other tropical fruits. Pity that five thousand fugitive slaves were not at this moment located upon it, under the guidance and instruction of such a man as Mr. Ward. What an example they might set.

According to the evidence of Sir Henry Barkly before the House of Commons, the continuous labour of one able hand for a year is necessary to produce four hogsheads of sugar, or 100 hands, 400 hogsheads. According to Bessemers meth od of manufacture, nearly the whole of the sacharine matter being extracted from the canes, and converted in two days into fine dry chrystals of sugar, the same labour would produce at least six hogsheads of sugar, and this would be worth £100; less £12 for manufacture, £88.

It thus appears, that every industrious family in the tropics, may, if they can obtain four or five acres of good land, by temperate labour upon it, earn from £130 to £140 a year. Cotton is not so certain a crop, but as provisions may be grown with it, would be found very profitable. Each family possessed of five acres of good land, might in addition to an abundance of food and fruit, raise three bales of Sea Island Cotton every year, which would be worth £80, less charges, packing and freight, say ten pounds. If the land were thorough drained, and consequently ploughed for them, they might with ease produce double the quantity.

Can the fugitive Slaves in Canada do as much for themselves where they are? If not, will it not be the kindest and best thing to assist them to remove to Jamaica or British Guiana; and with a view to thus making one or other of these countries their settled home, to enable a few of them in the first instance to make the experiment? The Rev. Mr. Garnet, who is well known to the friends of negro freedom in England, has led the way, and if Mr. Ward and his family, with fifty or a hundred equally industrious and skilful families, were to follow, it would probably lead to the final settlement there of many thousands of fugitives from the land in which they are now, not only enslaved, but treated as an inferior, and incapable race.

On British soil, suited to their constitutions and habits, under the protection of the Queen, Parliament and people of England, they might teach, not only the Americans, but all Slave-holders, the folly, as well as the iniquity, of their attempts to enrich themselves by the debasement, slavery, and oppression of their fellows.

Professor Stowe was quite right when he told the people of England, that all their christian counsels to Slave-holders would be vain, so long as they did not take means to supply the market with an abundance of Cotton and Sugar. B.

Annexation of Canada.

The subjoined, from the Richmond Virginia Daily Dispatch of June 13, gives the Southern view of annexation, and the opinion they hold of the people to be annexed. We can hardly imagine a more thoroughly contemptible set of beings, than that class of republicans, and by the way, the large class, too, to which the writer belongs. But the most interesting part of the tirade, is the small attempt at consequence of this "cockney" Virginian. Much harm will it do to Canadians. (?)

"The Free Soil press of the North in their flippant talk about the annexation of Canada, pretend that the people of that province would desire annexation to the United States but for slavery. That is purely a Free Soil romance. The Canadians dislike slavery, it is true, partly because they sedulously imitate the likes and dislikes of the mother country, and partly because slavery is an institution of a republic which they envy and hate with all the spite of their little hearts. But, annexation—annexation to the United States, or to any section of the United States—why their gorge rises at the very thought! They spurn it with the most sublime contempt. If you would talk of annexing the United States to Canada, why that, provided the United States would abolish slavery, might receive their gracious consideration. No dog ever followed his master with a more loyal heart than Canada trots at the heels of Great Britain. The lofty self-complacency and majestic scorn with which Canadians regard Americans is only equalled by that of the thorough-bred London cockney whom they copy in all things. One of these inflated mortals, with his head confined in the stiffest of shirt collars, his eyes refusing to look either to the right or the left, and his whole appearance indicating the most thorough indifference to all sublunary things, is as admirable to a Canadian as he is ridiculous to an American.

"Great Britain could not drive off the Canadians with bayonets and cannon. They are more thoroughly English than the English themselves. They have all the self-complacency, arrogance and impertinence of the vulgarians of England, with none of the refinement and courtesy of the nobility. We have enough of such stock in our own country already, without annexing a whole province of them."

The Festival.

The Anti-Slavery Festival in aid of this paper, came off as advertised, on Thursday evening, and on behalf of the Managers, we take this the earliest period possible, to tender thanks to the citizens of Toronto who were in attendance on the occasion. The gathering was by no means large, though quite up to our expectations, considering the many and variety of means at work to prevent its success—the company was respectable, and deeply interested to a late hour in the manner and matter of the several speakers. The Rev. Dr. Burns made an excellent opening speech, brimful of earnest and beautiful thoughts, and was followed by the Rev. Mr. Ormiston, in a brilliant and powerful discourse, which, though the first anti-slavery speech, ever made by him, was, we affirm, without fear of contradiction, and without disparagement to any other speaker, the best one made in Toronto this year. Mr. Ormiston is now what most of the great speakers of the present time have been years trying to become,—a great orator, endowed with large conscientiousness, and eminently gifted in other respects—large scope of thought and observation, an exuberance of language and great power of utterance; it needs no prophet to foretel the grand prospect before him in the anti-slavery field. Mr. Newman followed, saying many interesting things in his best style. He, as well as the preceding speaker, drew attention to the Freeman and its claims. Mr. Newman adverted to the policy of "Frederick Douglass and his satellites." Mr. J. B. Smith closed in an eulogy of Fredrick Douglass and Mr. Ward,—a charge against the steward of the Peerless for bad treatment—and a charge of discord among the colored people. We will long remember this Festival—though thinly attended—it was not without significant points. The colored people now know their friends, we think, as well as the flunkeys among their own numbers. Yet—we are encouraged, by the "turn" of events, not discouraged—shall look hopefully to the future in view of the past Festival; and as we are no better than the Scottish king who could take lessons in perseverance from a spider, we shall "try try again." *

At a meeting of the citizens of Hamilton, it was decided to unite with the Torontonians in the celebration on the First of August, provided our citizens intend to observe the day. We are requested to say, that a meeting has been held here, the minutes of which has not been published, at which they determined to invite Hamiltonians and persons from other places to join with them; and should those coming, notify them of the hour of their arrival, the procession will meet them at the wharf. So be not tardy in your preparations friends. A procession will be formed, and a dinner and tea-meeting will also be prepared for citizens and strangers. *

Several frame buildings beginning at the corner of Queen and Yonge streets, were destroyed by fire on Tuesday last. *

Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

MR. EDITOR,—I was pleased to see the interest manifested in favor of the "Provincial Freeman" on the part of the colored people of this city. It shews their determination to support a vehicle through which they can express their views and feelings to the world. If you cleared nothing by the operation it is a complete demonstration of the favor in which the paper is held by our colored friends, and I doubt not the same of a large portion of our white fellow subjects when they come to know more of its principles and objects.

Time will not admit, or I would say more on this subject.

Fugitive Slave Law declared Unconstitutional.

Judge Smith, of Wisconsin, has rendered a decision in the case of S. M. Booth, arrested for participating in the Glover rescue, at Milwaukie. The decision is against the constitutionality of the Fugitive Law, on the following grounds:

1. Congress has no constitutional power to legislate on the subject of reclaiming fugitive slaves.

2. Nor to clothe Court Commissioners with the power to determine the liberties of the people, and

3. Because this Act denies the right of trial by Jury.

The following is the order of the Court, discharging Mr. Booth from arrest:

In the matter of the Petition of Sherman M. Booth, for a writ of Habeas Corpus, and to be discharged from Imprisonment.

This matter having been heard upon the petition, and return to the writ issued herein, and the return of the respondent Stephen V. R. Ableman thereto, and having been argued by counsel; and there appearing no sufficient cause or warrant for the detention of the said Sherman M. Booth, and no sufficient reason being shown why he should be restrained of his liberty by reason of the premises, or of anything contained in the return to the said writ of Habeas Corpus, or for any other cause; it is therefore hereby ordered that the said Sherman Booth be, and he is hereby, discharged from the said imprisonment whereof he has complained, and that he go hence, and at large, without delay.

Missionaries for Nebraska and Kansas.

Now that the treason is accomplished, and FREEDOM IS TO BE INVADED in the vast territories of Nebraska and Kansas, that we may not be partakers in the crime by submissive loyalty to this heaven-daring despotism, we are ready, in common with our fellow-citizens, to unite morally, politically, and in every righteous manner, to defeat the objects of the heartless conspirators.—Our direct mission, however, is evident and clear. We have in former numbers of our paper expressed the intention of sending missionaries to Nebraska and Kansas, and now stand ready to fulfil our purpose.

Measures are in progress in Massachusetts and elsewhere, and will also be adopted here, to promote free emigration on a great scale to those Territories. Colonies will probably soon be on their way. These colonies will need Christian missionaries—men true to God, to liberty, and righteousness: to go with them, and strengthen and cheer them; men who, while giving to them and their children the free and pure gospel of Christ, will share with them in their sacrifice, and ultimately rejoice with them in their triumph. We are in correspondence with parties engaged in aiding emigration. One pastor in this city has called to declare his desire to go out with some colony as their minister. We invite other true men inclined to this field, to correspond with us on this subject; and we call upon all lovers of Christ and humanity to aid in this measure. —Am. Missionary.

Outrage and Excitement near Xenia.

On Thursday of last week, a man named McCord, who had been stopping in and about Xenia for a few days, and who is represented as being a disreputable person, left that town in a buggy and drove toward Selma. A few miles out he overtook a coloured man whom he suspected of being a fugitive slave, and asked him to get in and ride to the next cross roads. The negro thanked him and got into the buggy, but at the first farm house McCord said he must feed his horse, and persuaded the negro to wait. McCord went into the house and succeeded in making a bargain with the farmer to help in securing the supposed slave for half the reward. The negro was invited in a room to eat, was seized, tied with ropes and placed in the buggy to be driven toward Cedarville on the railroad. The man who had assisted and his son accompanied McCord. After proceeding a mile or two the slave broke his rope and then broke for the woods, chased by all three of the party. The old man nearly overtook the negro, when the latter turned and dealt a blow so powerful that it broke the arm of his pursuer, but he was soon after caught, beaten, and tied into the buggy again. Before they had proceeded much further the negro broke the cords a second time and had nearly escaped, when McCord grappled with him, and the others coming up, a fight ensued, in which the negro was beaten until he fell dead!

The party placed the corpse upright against an oak tree at some distance from the road and fled. The body was discovered, and on Saturday the frightened son of the farmer confessed to the circumstances above narrated. The three culprits are now lying in Xenia jail. The excitement in the surrounding country is intense.—Cincinnati Commercial.

A Slave Murdered in Virginia.

The following is from a letter from a gentleman who has been observing men and things at the South. It was written on the 20th ult. We extract an account of a horrid affair which occurred in Nelson county, Va., on the 18th, two days before the letter was written:

"I had not thought that so heart-rending a scene from 'Uncle Tom's Cabin' would come under my own observation. Day before yesterday a slave, a young man in the prime of life, was whipped to death by the overseer of a plantation in this neighborhood. 'He was worth $1,000.' The overseer tied him in the barn, and beat him for four hours. I am told that he was whipped for a very trifling offence. When so exhausted that he fainted, the poor fellow was washed with brine, then whipped, and washed again. This was repeated six times. He was tied up soon after breakfast, and released about one o'clock, and sent to the field to work. He fainted in the field. A shower came on, and he contrived to get into the barn, where he died.—While the overseer was beating him, he begged of him to shoot him; while he could speak, he kept moaning, 'O massa!' His master and mistress are not at home. There is great indignation in the neighborhood, but what they will do I cannot say. This is not the first Legree I have heard tell about; but it is the first genuine Legree case that has fallen under my observation. The overseer has not been arrested and moves about as if he had done nothing uncommon."—Buffalo Democrat.

Summary.

Sickness among the Emigrants.—The steamer Lord Elgin, belonging to Wilson Browne, Esq., of Hamilton, arrived in this city, at Maitland's wharf, Monday afternoon, direct from Quebec. The vessel was literally loaded with emigrants from Germany, and the poor creatures were in a most filthy state, and many labouring from severe illness. Two men and two children, we are informed, died on the passage from Quebec, and when the boat touched here, there were three in a very weak and exhausted state, so much so, indeed, that the recovery of two was dispaired of, and the other was also sinking rapidly. Drs. King and Herrick visited the vessel, and after examining these cases and ascertaining the symptons they showed during their illness, the former gentleman pronounced the disease to be Asiatic cholera. Dr. Herrick, however, hesitated to give the same opinion, Notwithstanding all the warnings urged upon the city authorities as to the necessity of making preparations for receiving emigrants afflicted with this disease, now when it is supposed to have presented itself, not the slightest accommodation could be afforded, and the emigrants were obliged to be left on board-ship to await apparently certain death. Not a a member of the Board of Health could be found to suggest even as much as might tend to prove there was such a body in existence. There was a report in town last night that eleven persons evincing symptons of Asiatic cholera in its worst stages were lying in Lewiston.—Leader.

Infamous Deception.—A workman in a wine establishment informed Mr. E. C. Delavan that $100 is frequently made on a single cask of wine, which did not contain a drop of the juice of the grape, but was made from whiskey and drugs.

A slave who has resided some time in Manchester, receiving word from the Boston Vigilance Committee that claimants were after him, procured money from friends, left Manchester about the middle of Sunday afternoon for Canada. The owner reached Manchester on Monday—too late to be of any avail.

Cholera.—There were fifty-seven deaths from this disease in this city last week. The victims were of the class who inhabit the filthiest localities of the town. There is no panic, but the city authorities are properly taking measures to prevent the spread of the disease.—N. Y. Standard.

There is a shop for the sale of samshoo, or rice whiskey in Hong Kong, which bears the following inscription:—"The joys of paradise are nothing compared with a perpetual drunk!"

Emigration to Canada.—The ship Commodore sailed from the Tail of the Bank on the 24th May. She carries 291 adult emigrants, the greater number under engagement to Messrs. Peto, Jackson, Brassy, and Betts, to work on the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada. These gentlemen give passages to the workmen whom they engage, and repay themselves by deductions of 1s. a day from the wages stipulated. When the passage money is in this manner repaid, the workmen, if they choose, may leave the employment, so that the engagement is merely to the effect of working till such time as the passage money is repaid. It is a simple and effective plan of colonization. While providing themselves with workmen for the execution of the Railway, the contractors are at the same time planting the country through which it runs with a population that will become its customers, and feed it with its future traffic. Many of these workmen will settle down as farmers alongside of the line, and will use it for sending their produce to the shipping ports for England. The dense forests of Canada will be converted into grain fields for the supply of England with wheat and breadstuffs.—Glasgow Post.

Emigration from the Highlands.—The Inverness Courier understands that about £3,000 has been paid by the banks in Portree, Isle of Skye, in sums varying from £5 to £20, being remittances from Highland emigrants in Australia to their poor relatives at home. This fact, so highly creditable to the Highland emigrants, has the effect of stimulating the present rage for emigration, and numbers of poor families, it is said, will leave the Hebrides this year. Mr. Chant, the government officer, has been in Skye making arrangements for this purpose.

Slave Case in Harrisburg, Pa.—On the evening of the 12th instant, three Marylanders and a Marshal from Philadelphia made their advent in Harrisburg, with a warrant from a Philadelphia Commissioner, for the purpose of taking a coloured man who was claimed by one of the party as his slave. The man was working at the time in one of the brick-yards in town. A hint was given the man, and long before morning he had taken passage by the "Underground Railroad," to the great disappointment of the "nigger-catchers."

That those who, without crime, are outlawed by any government, can owe no allegiance to its enactments—that, being condemned and treated as outlaws by government for no crime but that of claiming to be men rather than beasts and chattels, we hereby declare ourselves absolved from all obligations to obey its slave-holding behests, and fall back upon our natural rights; that we adopt and advise all oppressed to adopt the motto, "Liberty or death," nor will we allow any fellow beings to be enslaved if we can prevent it; that resistance to the slave-hunters is obedience to God, and we pledge ourselves to resist all such laws by such means as we shall deem right and expedient.

Treatment of Persons Struck with Lightning.—E. Merriam, the meteorologist, of Brooklyn, renews the recommendation to apply cold water freely to persons struck by lightning. He says:—"In all cases where persons are struck down by lightning use cold water on the body for hours, do not be discouraged if immediate success is not attained, continue to persevere, and if, after three or four hours' drenching, animation is not restored, add salt to the water, and continue the drenching. I have an account of a person struck down by lightning on Staten Island several years ago, who was restored after several hours' drenching with cold water. This case alone is sufficient to prompt to exertions in all cases beyond the time usually devoted to restoration of animation in cases where persons have been struck down by lightning."

Eleven Men Carried over a Cataract.—We imagine that our readers have heard of the narrow escape of eleven raftsmen, a few days ago, who passed over the Chats rapids in a fog, with several cribs of timber. It appears that they were directing the cribs toward the head of the Victoria slide, but owing to the dense fog passed into the old timber channel and so over the falls. Three of the men saved themselves before the cribs entered the broken water, one of them by making a leap into a cedar tree which overhung the channel, the other eight clung to the cribs, which were broken up into single sticks, but most providentially no life was lost, a truly miraculous circumstance, when we know the character of the cataract over which they were precipitated. Two of the men who first got to shore, not knowing whether their comrades had escaped or not, went to the slide master and begged the loan of a punt to go in search of them, and our readers will hardly believe that this inhuman and churlish official actually refused to lend it.—Lower Canada Times.

☞ "In Constantinople, a manufactory has been established for those fatal balls, of which so large a quantity has been of late imported into the East. They were discovered by an apothecary, and are said to be fill d with some species of gas or chloroform, and explode on falling upon or striking any object. An experiment is said to have been made at Cherbourg with an old vessel, in the hold of which some thirty dogs were shut up, all of which were found stone dead within a few minutes, after the ball had entered."

Canada.—The Washington Correspondent of the North American says that "a number of Southern Senators are said to have declared that they would oppose any treaty for the settlement of the Fishery question, or for the establishment of reciprocal trade with Canada, unless it shall contain a clause for the surrender of fugitive slaves."

A couple of the most efficient Shakers of Engfield have cut the society and got married. The New Haven Register says they were heretofore regarded as fire-proof specimens of the order. Probably couldn't stand it any longer.

Destruction of a Convent by Fire.

The Loretto Convent, Dollymount, Ireland, was completely destroyed by fire on Thursday, June 1st. It appears that in order, according to the ritual of the Roman Catholic church, to celebrate the anniversary of the Ascension of our blessed Saviour in a proper manner, the chapel of the convent was hung in draperies. The priest was in the act of celebrating mass when some of the gauzy substances used in the decoration of the altar became ignited, and in a very short time the entire building was enveloped in flames. For a considerable period, the fire had full play over the valuable structure, and when assistance did arrive, it was of little or no value. A strong guard of constabulary and three engines reached the convent in about an hour after the fire broke out, but all their exertions were abortive, and the building and furniture which were valued at £7,000, were completely destroyed. With the exception of one of the sisterhood, who was slightly scorched, all the boarders and inmates escaped without sustaining any injury. Up to a late hour on Thursday night the fire was still smouldering.—Dublin paper.

Tourists in Turkey.

Correspondence of the London Times.

Constantinople, Monday, May 15, 1854.

To the habitual resident there is some amusement in watching the stream of visitors of all nations, though principally of our own country there is something phantasmagorial in the manner in which they appear, flicker before the eyes, and then vanish in the void. All come with the same views, do the same thing, and disappear, leaving no trace of their existence, except in the coffers of their hosts. The stream is less steady now, and though it may not dry up, it will no doubt trickle and run more slowly as curiosity becomes sated and roads unsafe. Next to Englishmen, Americans have been the most numerous, and we have had them of all sorts. There have been philosophers of the Boston school, who have passed through several shades of communism, and New York fashionables, who might be taken for Frenchmen till they open their mouths, and who have much to say about the Tuileries and the Imperial balls to which they are in the habit of resorting. Visitors to Shumla are as numerous as ever, though they now go confessedly as spectators, and would excite a smile by hinting their hopes of a place on Omar Pasha's staff. What they can expect to see at present, it is difficult to say. A wretched Bulgarian town, with dirty dens for its fairest residences, the streets choked with dunghills so pestilential that in summer the place is a grave to all who are not acclimatized: with food bad and dear, with excursions in the environs dangerous, the day long, hot and wearisome, and night made restless by swarms of vermin—such is Shumla in the month of May.

The Paris Moniteur contains a decree by the Austrian Government prescribing the course to be adopted by the commanders of vessels carrying the Austrian flag during the war. This decree is dated May 25th.

The Moniteur in noticing the meeting of the Emperor of Austria and the King of Prussia at Tescheu, says there is no doubt that the object of the interview to concert together respecting the eventualities pointed to by the treaty of Berlin, and that the best results are expected from the interviews.

A letter from Trebigul, says Selim Pasha has sent 10,000 regular troops and 9,000 Bachi Bougouks to Ogonegueti.

The Russians have left Ogonegueti for Koutais carrying with them 453 sick. The inhabitants of the latter place, on hearing of this movement, sent to the Russians to say that the place was in a state of famine, and that they would be badly received there.

Col. FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries and in some instances suffering from temporary illness and utter fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. Ward, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B Gribble, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. Thomas James, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Poetry.

The Farmer.

The well-known New England poet, Oliver W. Holmes, has described the true and noble farmer in the following lines —

"Clear the brown path, to meet the coulter's gleam,
Lo! on he comes behind his smoking team,
With toil's bright dew-drops on his sun-burnt brow,
The hero of the farm—the hero of the plough.
First in the field, before the reddening sun—
Last in the shadow when the day is done;
Line after line, along the bursting sod,
Marks the broad acres where his feet have trod.

These are the hands, whose sturdy labour brings
The peasant's food—the golden pomp of kings;
This is the page whose letters shall be seen,
Changed by the sun to words of living green,
This is the scholar whose immortal pen,
Spells the first lesson hunger taught to men,
These are the lines—O! Heaven command toil,
That fill thy deed, the charter of the soil.

Turn to their homes where faithful arms shall bind
To crown with peace their own untainted soil;
And turn to God—to freedom—to mankind;
If ever chained bondage, faction shall unbind,
These stately forms, that binding even now,
Bow'd their strong manhood to the humble plough
Shall rise erect, the guardians of the land,
The same stern iron in the same right hand,
Till graylock thunders to the parting sun,
The sword has conquered, what the ploughshare won.

Agricultural.

To Protect Corn from Birds.

A Medford, N. J., correspondent of the Country Gentleman says:

I noticed in the Cultivator a recommendation by a certain writer, to prevent the depredations of crows, blackbirds, &c., in the cornfields, by strewing plenty of shelled corn in the fields likely to be troubled with them. Now I have tried a less expensive plan for several years, which with me has been effectual to save my corn from crows, blackbirds, and I believe it has some effect even with mice. It is only to stir a little coal tar in the seed corn, until it is all covered with a very thin coat of it; and then stir in some ashes, or plaster would perhaps be better, to prevent the corn from sticking, and make it a little less unpleasant to handle. I have heard persons say that they had known corn treated in this way, that did not sprout, but it never happened so with me. If Carolina tar is more easily obtained than the other, it may be used by first making the corn hot with a little boiling water poured into it, and after standing a minute or two, strain it off before stirring in the tar. I have used both kinds with perfect success. A good way of testing the corn prepared, is to throw a handful to the chickens; when, if a hungry hen will swallow two or three grains before she has time to notice the difference, and then has enough, you may be satisfied it will answer.

The process of dropping the grain is more tedious and unpleasant; but plenty of grease, soap and water, will bring the hands all right again.

Another correspondent says: I will give you my method, which I have followed for the last fifteen years, and during that time I have not had a hill of corn either scratched or pulled up by the crows or dunghill fowls. Being ready to plant, I take a tea or twelve quart pail, and fill it half full of seed corn.—I then pour in enough warm water to completely cover the seed; then put in a spoonful or two of tar, and by stirring with a stick a few minutes, mix the tar with the seed, and then drain off the water, and mix in plaster until the pail is full. Corn fixed in this way, no fowls or crows will trouble: and I am persuaded that if persons would try this simple method, they would not wish to go back again to the old method of sticking up scarecrows about their fields, or sow corn broadcast for feeding the crows.

The Corn Grub.

On many farms the common and destructive corn grub is more numerous than on others; or more properly speaking, certain lands are more subjected to it than others. This pest sometimes destroys whole fields of corn, after it is up an inch or two, cutting it off just above the ground, and dragging it partially into their holes. Many a one have we destroyed while at its work of destruction, and many a hill of corn have we replanted that had been entirely destroyed by it.

Latterly, however, several remedies have been found out by which the young plants may be protected against its depredations; the most effectual of which, so far as our actual knowledge extends, is in applying "plaster," to mix one part of fine salt with it, that is, to three parts of plaster add one of salt; apply about one table spoonful to each hill, taking care that the mixture does not come in contact with the young corn, or the salt will injure, if not destroy it.

This has been found out to be a sure protection. Fields that were treated that way in alternate rows, proved, that while a grub was not to be found in the salted rows, the others were seriously affected by them.

It is true there is some extra trouble attending it, as care must be taken in applying the mixture; yet what farmer has ever succeeded in raising any large crop on which extra care has not been bestowed?

We advise our friends to try this remedy this present month—on a portion of their fields, apply only to alternate rows, and let us know the result next month. It will then come fresh, and have due effect, either to approve or disapprove the remedy, so called.

It must be remembered, also, that the mixture of salt, will in addition, operate most beneficially on the crop as a manure, for it is believed that the same amount of money can scarcely be better appropriated than occasionally in a slight application of salt to farm lands.

Propagation of Fine Roses.

It may not be known to many of our readers, that the fine roses of the China varieties may be readily propagated by means of slips. Cut from the well ripened wood, slips three or four inches in length, strip off a part of the foliage, and insert them in clean white sand, placed in pots or boxes, keep them regularly watered, so that they may not get too dry, and at regular temperature. They strike root very freely. Some practice covering them with bell glass, but those of most experience do not consider the practice necessary. Ladies may also propagate any of the choice roses desired, by budding in the same manner as fruit trees are budded. It adds much to the hardy climbers, to have the main trunk variegated with branches of roses, of different shades of colouring. We strongly commend the practice to those who would thus adorn the shrubbery of the homestead.

A Profitable Farm.—The farm of Bryant Jackson, near Wilmington, Delaware, consists of 220 acres. On this farm he employs three hands all the year, at $132 per annum, each; two men extra for six months, at $12 per month, and day hands, whose wages amount to about $50 a year; making in all for labor, a cost of $590 a year. Mr. Jackson, in the American Farmer, says:—"The sales of the farm the last year will not vary much from fifty-three hundred dollars."

Best Feed for Milch Cows.—For every cow boil half a bushel of turnips; when boiled soft, add 4 quarts of bran, mix well and let it stand till cool. Give your cow a boiled mess like this once a day, and you will find your milk increase, and the milk does not taste of the turnips as it does when they are fed raw. By adding the bran while the turnips are hot, the bran swells, and you get the full good of it. This I have found to be the best and cheapest way to get the greatest quantity of good milk. —Country Gentleman.

Peach Tree Worms.—A correspondent at Perry, Wyoming county, N. Y., says: "My father has peach and apple orchards in Indiana. To preserve the roots of the trees, he is in the habit of putting about half a bushel of the stems of tobacco around each tree. He lays the stems around the roots of the tree on the top of the ground, once in two years. The plan has never failed to protect roots from all insects.

Will Ashes Dissolve Bones?

A friend of ours, in whom we have entire confidence, informs us that seven years ago, he fell into the practice of reducing bones by means of ashes, by a sort of fortunate blunder. Being at the head of a large family, in which fresh meat was largely consumed, he found that his Irish cook was in the habit of throwing all the bones out of the back window. This drew such a bevy of dogs, with voices, bass, tenor, and treble, about the house, that it was impossible to sleep quietly. In order to withdraw temptation from the dogs, and to preserve the bones for the use of his land, to be prepared in some way then unknown, he ordered the bones to be carried and put into an old sugar hogshead, placed in a grove at a little distance from the house, and the ashes from the kitchen to be thrown on them, the hogshead to be uncovered that the rain might fall into it. Whenever an offensive smell arose from the bones, which was only in dry times, he found that a little water thrown prevented it. As soon as the first hogshead was full, another was placed by it and filled, and then another. His intention was to use the ashes by the next spring; the next spring the bones would be somewhat softened, so much so that they might be pounded to pieces with a sledge hammer on a flat stone. The hammer and stone were actually procured for the purpose. But no bones were found except near the top of the hogshead last filled. Instead of the bones, were found soft soponaceous masses, retaining the form and size of the original bones, but none of their hardness. They were easily cut through with a shovel and mixed with the ashes; and when so mixed and applied to corn at the rate of half a pint to the hill, they proved an excellent manure for corn. The experiment has been repeated every year since with good effect, not only producing great crops of corn, but manifestly leaving the ground in good order for a succeeding crop, with but very little yard manure, no more than a quarter of what would be regarded as a fair dressing, say from three to four loads to the acre. The land is a light loam, and has been under the plow incessantly for more than twenty years, bearing for the last eight years hoed crops every year, generally corn and potatoes alternately, but some of the time, corn two years in succession.—Country Gentleman.

Witticisms.

Moving West.—"Philura, dear," said a loving husband to his loyal spouse, who was several years the junior, "What do you say to moving out West?"

"Oh, I'm delighted with the idea. You recollect when Morgan moved out there, he was as poor as we are, and he died in three years worth a hundred thousand dollars."

The Advantage of not being too Particular.—"Hans, how is your business now?"

"Oh so better as it was."

"How so?"

"Shut your eyes and listen mit me. Vell, de first night I opens der store, I counts der moneys, and finds it nix right—von tollar was gone. Vell, the nix night I count him, and dere be two tollars gone. De third night I count him, and there be tree dollars gone; and vot does yer think I does den?"

"I cannot say—what?"

"Vy, I did not count him any more, and he comes out shoost right ever since."

A Geologist Non-Repulsed.—An old bachelor geologist was boasting that every rock was as familiar to him as the alphabet. A lady, who was present, declared she knew of a rock of which he was totally ignorant. "Name it, madam!" cried Cœlebs, in a rage. "It is rock the cradle, sir," replied the lady. Cœlebs evaporated.

Two Sharps.—An old man picked up half a dollar in the street. "Old man, that's mine," said a keen-looking rascal, "so hand it over." "Did yours have a hole in it?" asked the old man. "Yes," replied the other, smartly.—"Then its not thine," mildly replied the old man: "thee must learn to be a little sharper next time, my boy."

One evening, Clerk had been dipping rather too deeply in the convivial bowl, with a friend in Queen Street, and on emerging into the open air, his intellect became in a considerable degree confused, and not being able to distinguish objects with any degree of certainty, he thought himself in a very fair way of losing the road to his own house in Picardy Place. In this perplexity, he espied some one coming towards him, whom he stopped with this query —"D'ye ken whaur John Clerk bides?" "Whats the use o' you speerin' that question?" said the man; you're John Clerk himself." "I ken that," answered John, "but its no himsel' that's wanted, it's his house."

If you don't wish to fall in love, keep away from calico. You can no more play with the girls without losing your heart, than you can at the roulette without losing your money. As Dobbs very justly observes, the heartstrings of a woman—like the tendrils of a vine—are always reaching out after more to cling to. The consequence is that before you are going, you are gone, like a one-legged stove at a street auction.

In the day of the patriarchs, a woman's conduct was the index of her heart. When, for example, the father of Rebecca asked if she would go with the servants of Isaac, she immediately replied, "I will go." Had she been a daughter of the nineteenth century, she would have answered, "Pshaw! go with him! Why, Mr. Isaac must be sick! Go with him! Of course I won't!" And then—she would have gone with him.

The other day an old lady rushed into the garden in search of her daughter, upon being told that the young lady had gone there with a "rake."

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"National Council of the Colored People."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches anxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper governmen

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

J. D. Bonner,
J. McCune Smith,
} Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "The American Industrial School."

2. The foundation fund shall be thirty thousand dollars.

3. Twenty thousand dollars shall be in stock of 2000 shares, at ten dollars per share.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Alienea American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the Gospel Tribune his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the Scripture Manual, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Coiporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-khown literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writere in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the Tribune's Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Sub-criptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books —the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, Robert Dick, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the Tribune's object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

Men and Brethren:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted rights, composing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the ruling element of society in which we live. The policy necessary to the preservation of this elemen must be in our favor, if ever we expect the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization sheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures and objects set forth in this Call as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. If not, then, there is no part of the wide spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

FORGERY.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

The public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

The Freeman's Challenge.

From the N. Y. Tribune.

"Come on, then, gentlemen of the Slave States! Since there is no escaping your challenge, I accept it in behalf of the cause of Freedom. We will engage in competition for the virgin soil of Kansas, and God give the victory to the side that is stronger in numbers, as it is in right."—W. H. Seward, in the U. S. Senate, May 25, 1854.

Come from the borders of the Old Dominion!
Come from the empire of the whip and chain!
Come to the battle of renewed opinion,
Roused from the slumber where it long has lain!
The soil is wasting, for the slave is master,
Ruling by terror in his owner's breast,
And blind devotion to the chain still faster
Hastens the virgin soil to needed rest.

Come from the Dismal Swamp of slavish terror!
Come from the fields where toils the sighing slave!
Come to the battle of the Truth with Error,
While in our prime we dig Oppression's grave!
Freedom points onward with a glorious bearing,
And bids the nation to a splendid noon,
And as she nerves us to a holy daring,
She gives the earnest of her richest boon!

Come from the borders of the far savannah—
Come from the everglades of hopeless doom!
Come where the Freeman with a loud hosannah
Shouts in exemption from the despot's gloom.
The pulse is beating with a new emotion—
The arm is lifted in an effort strong—
Our hearts are throbbing like the throb of ocean,
With vows undying at the bloody Wrong.

Come from the cane-fields where the lash grows longer!
Come from the cabin of the wretched thing!
Come from the region where the bonds grow stronger,
And life's red blood from bleeding hearts they wring!
Come from the slavemart where the human chattel
Buries his love, and dearest ties are spurned!
Come to the Freeman's now unending battle,
For bolder teachings in the Right are learned.

Come from the Senate-hall and dull convention;
Come from the pulpit and the crowded bar;
We take the challenge for the long contention,
And gird our armour for a ceaseless war!
Come from the waters of the Alabama—
Come on, O builders of a nation's doom!
We take the challenge; for the bloody drama
Must have an end, and Freedom fill its room.

Come on, then, Spoilers of the weak and lowly!
Come with your purposes of crime and wrong!
The North awakened with an ardor holy,
Vows with a firmer hope and vision strong!
We have been shaken from our trusting slumbers!
Now watch we well, with weapons true and bright!
God gave the victory to Truth's first numbers!
God give the victory to Truth and Right!

Mittie, the Blind Child.

BY MARY IRVING.

Did you ever thank God for you eyes, dear children? Those two bright, clear, happy eyes, that He has given to drink in the pleasant sunshine, the beauty of the flowers, the glory of the rainbow, and the sweetness of your dear mother's smile! Listen, now, to the story of a child to whom He never gave eyes to look upon any of these beautiful things.

It was on a sunshiny morning—somewhere in the middle of the Atlantic ocean—that a gentleman, whom seasickness had imprisoned in his state-room since the first roll of the ship, took courage, from a cup of coffee and the calmness of the sea, to crawl upon deck. As he stood at the head of the narrow stairway, clutching a rope to support his tottering steps, he heard a glad child's laugh.—Looking up, he saw a little girl, about five years old, quite at her ease, on the turning and rolling floor, trying to "jump rope" with a knotted end of ship rigging, which had been given her by an old sailor. The brisk breeze had brightened her cheeks, and curled her flowing hair in no very orderly manner. Mr. L, thought of his own little daughter over the ocean, and his eyes filled.

"Come to me my dear!" he kindly called, reaching his hand towards the child.

She stopped her play, looked up, as though half frightened, half astonished; and then began carefully to creep toward the outstretched hand. He lifted her to his lap, and kissed her coral lips.

"Whose little girl are you?" he inquired.

"I'm nobody's little girl," she replied, in a touching tone. "Only God takes care of me—and sometimes Captain I——."

"How, where is your mamma?"

"Mamma is in Burrampooter; I'm not her little girl any more"—here a tear rolled down her cheek. "I'm going to New York," she said, "to be uncle's little girl. But New York is a great way off, isn't it, sir?"

"Not a very long way, my child—you will soon see your uncle."

"I can't see, sir," she said, softly.

Mr. L. startled, and looked down into those bright, dark, intelligent eyes. Alas! it was too true! they were darkened windows, through which the soul could never look!

"Mittie! hey, Mittie!" called a bluff voice as the captain's varnished hat appeared from behind the mast. "Eh, birdie, what new nest have you found?"

With a start and a bound, Mittie jumped into his rough arms, and laid her cheek upon the shoulder of his shaggy coat sleeve.

"So-ho, shipmate," continued the captain, addressing Mr. L. "you are aloft at last.—Nothing like a stiff nor'wester for taking the starch out of you landsfolk." And he laughed.

"But this little girl, Captain I——, how happens she to be alone on the wide world of waters?"

"Can't say," returned the captain, with a dubious shake of his shining hat. "She's a stray waif that I picked up on the Liverpool docks. Don't know her belongings; she was labelled for New York, it seems. Her name—what's the balance of it sea-bird?" he asked.

"Mittie Wythe Hamilton," lisped the child who had already found her way back to her bit of rope, and sat against the ships railing, tossing up hands at every new dash of spray. "I was named for Uncle Wythe, and he told mamma to send me." Her face clouded for an instant, then brightened again in the sunshine.

"Poor blind pet! so far as I can make out her story from one thing and another, she is the child of missionaries in India. Poor creatures, they could not bring her over themselves, and I dare say she was getting no good in that heathenish land; so it seems they put her in charge of an English lady, name I've forgotten, who set out to join her husband somewhere in Canada. But she sickened and died before the barque Sally reached England, and the poor thing was left friendless and helpless. What the captain and mate of the Sally were thinking of I don't know; but they put the child on dry land, with the balance of the passengers, and set sail without so much as looking up a New York packet. Alone in Liverpool—and it's no place for a blind child, sir, to say nothing of one that's got eyes—I found her amusing herself pretty much as you see her now, with bits of chips, at the corner of a ship yard! How the creature had lived, I can't say. I'll believe after this, shipmate, there's God in the sky, who, as she says, keeps watch over children; if he don't over us grown-up sinners! It seems she had never wanted for a berth nor a mess. 'I want to go to New York,' she would say to every stranger who spoke to her. I couldn't have left the little thing—but I don't know where I'm taking her. If I can't anchor her safely, I'll keep her for first mate of the Down; hey, sea-bird?"

"What could you do with her in that terrible storm off Cape Clear? I shudder to recollect that night!"

"Well, sir, while you were lying flat on your back, and the rest of us were hurrying, hauling and pulling hither and thither, working for dear life against the winds and waves, the pretty creature was rolling about the cabin floor, clapping her hands as though she were in an apple-tree swing, and found it capital fun! When I tumbled down to my locker for five minutes' rest, I found her on her knees, in her little night wrapper, saying, 'Our Father,' and I felt sure no storm would sink the ship with her on it!"

Poor mother of Mittie! how her heart wrung at sending her blind, trusting child from her arms! But her brother in America had written, telling her that he would provide for Mittie, poor sightless Mittie, who could learn little in that uncivilized land.—So with many tears and prayers that missionary mother had packed her Mittie's small trunk, and placed her under the care of a friend—the English lady before mentioned—to be transported to our country. What but a mother's prayer guarded the helpless darling in her lonely wanderings!"

On arriving at New York, Captain I—— and Mr —— made inquiry everywhere for Mr. Wythe. Directories were searched, streets ransacked, and questions repeated hundreds of times, to no purpose. No relative of the poor blind Mittie could be found.

"Leave her with me, captain," said Mr. L——. "I am soon to return to London, but, before sailing, I will place her in an asylum for the blind, and see that she is comfortably cared for."

Instead, however, of placing Mittie in the State Asylum of New York, her friend took her to a Southern city, where he had business connections, and left her in one of those beautiful retreats, which nature and art have combined to adorn for those whose eyes tell not night from day, nor beauty from deformity.

Kind voices welcomed the little stranger, but they were voices she had never heard, nor hoped to hear. For the first time since she sobbed good-bye on her mother's lap, her hope and faith faltered. She felt that she was alone in the world, and she sought out a corner to cry. Had the superintendent particularly interested himself in the child he would have found out her history, and probably have sought some communication with her parents. But setting down her name as a charity scholar, he forgot that she was not an orphan.

And Mr. L——? His sympathies had been strongly enlisted, and he really intended to find out the mystery. But he was a man of the world, and immersed in its busy cares. Having placed a sum of money for her use in the hands of the director, with permission to apply to him in any emergency, he returned to his English home—and only remembered the blind child of the voyage at moments when his own laughing Carrie climbed into his lap.

One among a hundred children, Mittie was well educated in all that the blind can learn. She was taught how to read the Bible, from which her mother had read to her, by passing her small fingers over the curiously-raised letters. She learned to sew, to braid, and to write—strange thoughts that young head used to frame, for that unsteady hand to jot down in its crooked wanderings over the paper. She learned to sing sweet hymns of her school-mates, and touch for herself the keys of the piano, whose melodies had almost made her fancy herself in heaven, only that she had been told that in heaven she should see like other children! Sometimes, in her dreams, she would find herself on a soft couch, with strange perfumes and sounds about her, and would feel warm tears dropping, one by one, on her forehead, while a dear arm pressed her closely.

"Mother! dear mother!" Mittie would cry, and wake—to find no mother.

Years had passed—when again a ship was nearing the forests of masts in New York harbour. On the deck sat a pale lady, in deep mourning, with traces of tears upon her cheeks. Her children clung about her, with wonder in their faces

"Oh, beautiful America! the America you have so often told us about," cried a sweet-voiced girl of twelve. "Mamma, does it look as it did when you went away?"

"Mamma, did you live in any of those great houses?"

"Ma, ma! plenty Pagodas here!" chimed in the youngest boy, whose eye had taken in the numerous church spires. All spoke at once, but the mother answered neither.—Her heart was too full. She had gone from that shore, a happy bride, and hopeful; she was returning, a widow, broken in health and spirits, to place her children with her relatives, and then, as she believed, to lay her bones in the tomb of her kindred. One hope only made her heart bound, and her cheek grew paler, as she looked on that shore of her nativity, for the first time in twenty years.

"Oh, God! could I see all my children before I die!" she faltered.

I pass over the scene of her landing, and welcome to the house of her brother. I will not stop to tell you how many wonders the Indian-born children found in American city customs and sights; for I must hasten to the end of my story.

"It is impossible, sister," said her brother to the pale lady one morning, in answer to some expression. "The child could never have reached this country. We never, as you know, have traced her farther than England, and if she had been brought here, she could not have failed to find me, or I her."

The widow sighed. "God's will be done!" she murmured. "But it is hard to feel that my little helpless innocent—my eldest born—was sent from me to perish alone. Often I feel as if it could not be—as if she were yet alive, and I should find her at some day."

Providentially, as it proved, the mother was led to search the catalogues of various institutions for the blind, long in vain. At length she obtained a circular from a distant city, and glanced over it indifferently, so often had she been disappointed. Her heart sprung to her lips as she saw the name, "Meta W. Hamilton."

"Brother!" she gasped, extending the paper to him.

He looked, and shook his head. "I'm afraid you are expecting too much my poor sister. Matilda was your darling's name; and then, how should she stray to that corner of the United States?"

But the mother's hope was stronger than her fears. She scarcely ate or slept, weak though she was, until she reached the Southern city whose name the catalogue had borne.

"Hamilton? Yes, we have a pupil by that name," replied the bland superintendent, in answer to her first question of trembling eagerness.

"But she is an orphan, madam."

"Are you sure, sir? Oh, I must see her at once!"

She followed him to the door of a large room, where fifty girls sat, busied with their books and needlework. The buzz of conversation died, as they heard the sound of strange footsteps, and a hundred sightless were turned toward the door.

Near a table, on which lay a bunch of delicate straw filaments, sat Mittie Hamilton.—She had been braiding a bonnet, but her fingers had ceased their work, and, buried in a sort of reverie, she was the only one who did not notice the entrance of a stranger.

"Was there any distinguishing feature by which you would recognize your daughter, my dear madam?" asked the gentleman.

The mother's eye wandered over the group, as though she dreaded the confirmation of her fears to lose her last hope.

"Show me the child of whom you spoke," she faltered.

"Meta Hamilton,"—but he stopped, for at the lady's first word, Mittie had sprung from her position, and, throwing back the curls from her face, turned wildly from side to side.

"What is that?" she cried with outstretched arms. "That voice—speak again!"

"Mittie, my child!" cried Mrs. Hamilton, springing to her side, and sinking overpowered, upon her knees.

"Mother, oh mother!" and Mittie fell into the arms that had cradled her in infancy.

That was a moment never to be forgotten!

Uncle Wythe Harris (for the mistake which had clouded so many years of the lifetime of mother and child, was that of Mittie in substituting—child that she was—the first name of her uncle for the last) found a pleasant cottage on the banks of the Hudson for his sister and her now happy family. What a loving welcome the dear girls and boys, whom Heaven had blessed with the power of seeing their sister, gave to the wanderer, Mittie! How she comforted her mother's heart, making her forget her great bereavement—making her even forget to sorrow that she had a blind child, in her joy at feeling that she had another living darling!

The sunshine of Mittie's girlhood came back to her spirit. The dear blind girl was the joy of the house. How could anybody cherish a feeling of discontent or peevishness, when that glad voice was pouring out its songs of thankfulness from morning until night! Oh, dear blind Mittie, never more—happy spirit that she was—mourned that God had not given her eyes to see. "He has given me back my mother," she once said, "and these precious brothers and sisters, and He will let me see them all in heaven!"—Little Pilgrim.

Bruin "Starring."

A frightful scene occurred at the theatre at Czerny, in Bohemia, during the performance of a melo-drama called the "Bear of the Mountain," the principal actor of which was a bruin of such wonderful docility and dramatic talent, that for a long succession of nights, he attracted overflowing audiences. On this occasion, however, something had put this "star" out of humor, and he was seen to be wanting in those brilliant displays of the histrionic which had previously overwhelmed him with applause. In the third act, instead of coming down the mountain by a winding path, with the slow and solemn step prescribed in prompter's book, he alighted on the stage at one bound, like the descent of an ærolite. On his return behind the scenes he received reproofs, which, instead of improving made his temper more sullen, and it was with difficulty he was prevailed upon to go through his part.

In the last scene he was induced to commence a waltz with a young and beautiful peasant girl, and seemed to take so much enjoyment in the dance, that the whole audience rose in their seats, and, standing on the benches, drowned the sound of a powerful orchestra with their acclamations of wonder and delight. In a moment, however, the joyous spectacle was changed into a scene of terror. A piercing shriek was heard through the tumult, and the lovely dancer was hurdled round with a velocity of a wift wheel, and discharged from her partner's arms headforemost into the pit, where, however, she was caught by the audience without damage.

The next moment the stage lover of the peasant girl, who had been coquetting in a dance in the distance with a group of ballet dancers, advanced, in the performance of his part, to waltz with the bear. The former catastrophe had been so rapid, that, though his danger was fully perceived by the audence, whose cries were quite loud enough to deter him, it was evidently unperceived by the lover. The bear was instantly on the qui vive, measuring him from top to toe and flinging his legs around him, began to waltz with such extraordinary boundings, that the astonished lover was soon whirled off his feet, and in another moment was at the top of a stage precipice, and tossed into the surges below. The astonishment now, however, had turned into consternation. The bear was seen dancing forward, evidently pleased with his own exploits, and with his muzzle broken, the nose hanging loose around his neck, and roaring fiercely.

The whole audience now started on their feet, rolled over each other, and in their attempt to escape choked up the door of the pit, boxes and gallery. The town police were now called in, formed a circle, and charged the bear with fixed bayonets. Firing was out of the question, as the bullets which missed the bear must take effect on the audience; but the bear, though left alone, exhibited the adroitnes of education, and the intrepidity of his nature. A part of his training had been the platoon exercise, and suddenly knocking down a corporal of the guard with one paw, and seizing his musket with the other, he threw his belt over his back, proceeded deliberately to prime and load. The terror of the audience was now extreme, and shrieks were heard from all sides, as he pointed the muzzle towards the crowded pit.

The guard, which had regarded it as a remarkable effort of city valor to have approached him at all, now widened their circle in all directions, to a respectable distance from an antagonist armed alike with the ferocity of savage nature and the weapons of civilization. But the bear, already long accustomed to military manœuvres, and who had exhibited lately at St. Petersburg, in the pantomime of the battle of Pultowa, palpably took the Swedish captive, and picked out each of them from their hiding place by a tender touch at the point of the bayonet. In all their fright, the audience roared with laughter; it was evident that his pantomimical recollection was still strong upon him, for he compelled every man of his captives to kneel down upon the stage, strip off his accoutrements, and beg for his life.

A flourish of trumpets should have followed this unequivocal victory, but the orchestra, half terrified out of their lives by the near neighborhood of the conqueror, had forgot this part of their duty. The bear now advanced to the front of the stage, growled fiercely at the kettle drummer, and finding that his signal was not obeyed, he made one mighty bound at the drum itself, and rolled into the orchestra. All the performers now ran for their lives; desks were tumbled down, fiddles crushed, double basses shattered into fragments, and the sons of Apollo hiding themselves under their benches, scrambling over the rails, or making battle with the fragments of their trumpets and trombones, roared for help.

The audience, who saw that he had come so much nearer by the route of the orchestra, now tried to make their escape in every direction. Shrieks, and screams, roars and oaths, filled all parts of the theatre; but whether the bear thought that the operation was too tardy, or recollected some of the old scenes of towns taken by storm, he had no sooner prostrated the fiddlers than he sprang gallantly into the pit. Here was all confusion worse confounded. The rapidity of the flight equalled the terror of the moment, and each was electric; the bear stamping, bounding, and roaring, with all the air of a conqueror; and it was not until the theatre was completely cleared, and his roar had entirely subsided that the city guard, gathered from the stage, made a temporary lodgment in one of the lobbies.

The commander-in-chief made his approaches with the caution of science, and nothing could be more deliberate than the courage with which he opened the door of the stage box. There he discovered that the bear had fallen asleep in the lap of victory, and, in fact, was snoring at full length on one of the crimson benches in the pit. The Captain of the guard, distinguished in the city of Czerny for his valor, at this crisis of affairs boldly ventured forward, and ordered his platoon to fire a volley at the sleeping monster; but before this could be effected, the keepers of the menagerie from which the animal had been borrowed, came in with ropes and nets, and were allowed to supersede the guard. The bear very quietly followed his keepers, and the authorities of the city, on the plea that though bears might make very good actors, Bohemian actors would make very good bears, published a proclamation against Bruin's future appearance.—Foreign paper.

Razor Strap Redivivus.

The reporter of the San Francisco News, furnishes that paper with the following report of a speech made by a California Auctioneer:

"Ladies and gentlemen, I now have the honour of putting up a fine pocket handkerchief; a yard wide, a yard long, and almost a yard thick; one half cotton, and t'other half cotton, too; beautifully printed with stars and stripes on one side, and the stripes and stars on t'other; it will wipe dust from the eyes so completely as to be death to demagogues, and make politics as bad a business as printing papers; its dark colour will enable it to hide dirt, and never need washing; going at one dollar?—seventy-five cents?—fifty cents?—twenty-five cents?—one bit? Nobody wants it?—Oh, thank you, sir!

"Next gentlemen, for the ladies won't be permitted to bid on this article, it is a real, Simon pure, tempered, highly-polished keen-edged Sheffield razor; bran spanking new; never opened before to sun-light, moon-light, star-light, day-light, or gas-light; sharp enough to shave a lawyer, or cut a disagreeable acquaintance, or a poor relation, handle of buck-horn; with all the rivets, but two at the ends, of pure gold: Who will give two dollars? one dollar? half a dollar? Why ye, long-bearded dirty faced reprobates, with not room enough on your phizzes for a Chinese woman to kiss, I'm offering you a bargain at half a dollar! Well, I will throw in this strap at half a dollar!—razor and strap a recent patent; two rubs upon it will sharpen the city attorney; all for four bits; and a piece of soap—sweeter than roses; lathers better than a school-master; and strong enough to wash out all stains from a California politician's countenance, all for four bits!—why, you have only to put this razor strop and soap under your pillow at night, to wake up in the morning clean shaved; won't anybody give two bits, then, for the lot? I knew I would sell 'em.

"Next, ladies and gentlemen, I offer three pair of socks, hose, stockings or half hose, just as you're mind to call them. Knit by a machine made on purpose, out of cotton wool; the man that buys these will be enabled to walk till he gets tired; and, provided his boots are high enough, needn't have any corns; the legs are as long as bills again the corporation, and as thick as the heads of the members of the Legislature; who wants 'em at one half dollar?—thank-e-e, madam, dollar?

Next, I offer you a pair of boots, made especially for San Francisco, with heels long enough to raise a man up to the Hoadley grades, and nails to insure against being carried off by a land slide; legs wide enough to carry two revolvers and a bowie knife, and uppers of the very best horse leather. A man in these boots can move about as easy as the State Capital; who says twenty dollars? All the taxpayers ought to buy a pair to kick the council with; every body ought to have a pair to kick the Legislature with—and they will be found of assistance in kicking the bucket, especially if somebody should kick at being kicked—ten dollars for legs, uppers and soles! while souls, and miserably souls at that, are bringing twenty thousand dollars in Sacramento! ten dollars! ten dollars!—gone at ten dollars!

"Next is something that you ought to have gentlemen; a lot of good gallowses—sometimes called suspenders. I know that some of you will alter a while be furnished at the State's expense, but you can't tell which one, so buy where they're cheap; all that deserve hanging are not supplied with gallows, if so, there would be nobody to make laws, condemn criminals, or hang culprits, until a new election; made of pure gum elastic—stretch like a judge's conscience—and last as long as a California office holder will steal; buckles of pure iron, and warranted to hold so tight that no man's wife can rob him of the breeches, are, in short, as strong, as good, as perfect, as effectual, and as bona fide as the ordinance against Chinese shops on Dupont street—gone at twenty-five cents."

The Czar a "Macgregor."

A correspondent of the Scotsman gives the following, in proof that the Russian Autocrat is of Highland extraction: "The Emperor Paul was in London, when one day driving in his carriage through Hyde Park, he observed a lady, in the bloom of youth and beauty, riding past him on a Highland shelty. He stopped his carriage, made inquiry about her, found out who she was, got introduced to her father, and finally to herself, paid frequent visits to her at her father's house, was so much captivated by her beauty, accomplishments, and unassuming manners, that he offered her marriage, was accepted, and after all preliminaries were settled, some time after privately married to her. She went with him to Russia. The reader will wonder who this was; in answer I have to say that she was none other than the beautiful daughter of Macgregor, the Highland farmer of Bridge of Turk."

Russian Cookery.

Under this head may be included three dishes, one provided expressly for the Czar; another provided for discussion amongst foreign Ministers and Consuls; and a third done up for the swallow of the Russian people. The dishes alluded to are so many versions of a story; as for example, that of the bombardment of Odessa. We subjoin samples of these concoctions. They are all addressed to Nicholas; but

The First is Private and Confidential.

"Sire—With the greatest regret, I have the honor to inform your Majesty that, in revenge for a shot or two fired on a flag of truce, all the works of this town have been bombarded and utterly destroyed by the enemy's steamers, with the exception of the commercial mole. The shipping protected by the mole, and the town itself were unaccountably spared; but all the vessels of the Imperial mole were burnt. The powder magazine has been blown up; seven men have been killed, and three times that number wounded. I have the melancholy satisfaction of assuring your Majesty that I did all in my power to avert the calamity; but the men were shot at their guns; and, I am sorry to add, had to be pricked up to them by the swords of their officers. I may, however, congratulate your Majesty on the blunder committed by the enemy in sparing the commercial mole and city; which latter was occupied by soldiers, the inhabitants having all fled. Osten-Sacken."

The Second is Diplomatic.

"Sire—The allied fleets of France and England have bombarded this city and its defences, on the groundless pretence of having fired on one of their boats carrying a flag of truce. Thanks to the valor of your Majesty's gallant troops, whose loss has been small, the invaders were repelled, after inflicting a very trifling injury on the Imperial works, and a fortunately inconsiderable amount of wanton damage on our peaceful city. Nothing could equal the courage of the brave soldiers, except the fortitude of the faithful citizens. These, during the bombardment, thronged the churches, imploring protection for themselves and pardon for their enemies, who, schooled by the chastisement which they have received, will, it is to be hoped, hesitate in future to attempt the crime of spreading devastation and slaughter amid the pacific dwellings of commerce.
Osten-Sacken."

The Third is intended for Home Circulation.

"Sire—Again, by the favor of St. Nicholas and the blessing of St. Alexander Newski, a glorious victory has crowned your Majesty's arms.

"The combined French and English fleets, men-of-war and steamers, numbering 1,000 sail, have bombarded Odessa for forty-eight hours, providentially with no effect but the displacement of a few stones of the fortications, and the demolition of a house belonging to a Jew, and of a Latin Church.

"Our loss amounts to two men killed and five wounded. Seven hundred of the enemy's ships have been sunk, and two hundred set on fire and blown up.

"This glorious result must be attributed to the heroism of our gallant soldiers, inspired and aided by St. Nicholas and Alexander. Whilst the priests of the Orthodox Church, in her sacred temples, surrounded by adoring multitudes, and showers of shot, shells and rockets, were chanting the praises and invoking the help of the patrons of holy Russia, beheld a miracle! Those two celestial champions descended from the clouds; and whilst one of them stopped the balls of the enemy, the other helped the men to point their guns.

"Under these circumstances, I have directed a Te Deum to be sung in all our churches.
Osten-Sacken."

Thus, in Russian cookery, the dishes served to the Emperor are plain; those dressed for ambassadors and diplomatic agents are more spicy, and the richest and most highly seasoned are composed for the common people. Simple viands are esteemed a luxury, and nobody but the Czar tastes truth au naturel.

Getting the Quarter Back.—Yesterday, an incident occurred on the Saugus Branch Railroad, which shows how "quarters" sometimes change hands. A shrewd Yankee entered the railway station, having in his arms a small trunk, which doubtless contained his Sunday suit, and other valuables; an officer politely informed him that no baggage could be carried over the road without extra charge, and that he must pay for the transportation of his trunk, Jonathan paid the quarter, but could find no precedent for such a demand in the whole of his experience as a traveller. A brilliant idea flashed upon his mind, and he resolved not to lose his money; so, on observing the arrival of a verdant stranger, he approached him, and in the blandest manner possible, said: "I perceive you have a valise—no baggage allowed to pass over this road, according to the rules—I'll take a quarter." And he did; the stranger honored the draft, and Jonathan pocketed the money, took his seat in the cars, and gave himself up to reflection upon the management of railroad corporations and their patrons.—Boston Chronicle.

Desperate Spirit of the Missouri Slaveholders.

The St. Louis Republican, of June 13th, contains a communication from Independence, giving an account of two public meetings, one held at Westport, Missouri, on the 3rd of June, and the other at Independence, on the 5th. The letter was headed as follows: "Settlement of Nebraska and Kansas—Strong Resolutions—What the Abolitionists may expect." The correspondent says that both meetings were fully attended, and that so far as the main objects of the resolutions were concerned, there appears to be but one sentiment in that community, and the same may be said of the whole Western border. After a long preamble, couched in highly inflammatory language, and organizing themselves for mutual protection, they

Resolved, That we invite all well-disposed citizens, from wherever they may come, but more especially our fellow-citizens of the slaveholding States, to unite with us.

Resolved, That we will afford to each other mutual protection in claiming and holding lands in Kansas Territory; that we will not encroach upon the claims or rights of each other, nor will we allow any intruders to do the same; that until the country is surveyed, no claim shall be made nearer to any other than half a mile, securing to each settler a quarter section of land; and that we will protect and defend the claim of each and every individual of this organization, which may be staked off and designated by the claimant in good faith, and with a view to actual settlement.

Resolved, That we will carry with us into the new Territory of Kansas, every species of property, including slaves, and that we will hold and enjoy the same; that we desire to do so peacefully, and deprecate any necessity for resorting to violence in support of our just and lawful rights; yet (in no spirit of bravado, and with the strongest wish for peace,) apprehensive of interference with our private and domestic concerns by certain organized bands who are to be precipitated upon us, we notify all such, that our purpose is firm, to enjoy our rights, and to meet with the last argument all who shall in any way infringe upon them.

Resolved, That we recommend to our fellow-citizens of Missouri and Arkansas, more especially of the border counties, to organize, with these ends in view; and to each and every man who feels an interest in the destiny of the future State of Kansas, to be on the alert, that we may avail ourselves of the great advantages which the contiguity of the new Territory at once gives to us, and entitles us in moulding the government and institutions of the future State in accordance with those of our own, and thus guarantee for the future a good neighbour and a firm friend, united to us by the bond of interest.

At the Meeting at Independence, the following resolutions were adopted:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Jackson County, in mass meeting assembled, do hereby endorse, re-affirm and proclaim the justice and policy of the action and resolves of a portion of our fellow-citizens who recently convened at Westport, in this county; and that, in order to effectuate and carry out the object of that meeting, to secure and guarantee the rights of Southern emigrants to the Territory of Kansas, the Chairman of this meeting do appoint a Committee of Vigilance, whose duty it shall be to acquire full and reliable information of the progress of settlements in the new territory of Kansas, and of any infringement, or danger of infringement, upon the rights of Southern settlers, and to take proper steps to prevent and resist the same.

Resolved, That a Committee of Correspondence be also appointed, whose duty it shall be to embody, in the form of an address, all useful information concerning the advantages, situation, productions, &c., of the Territory of Kansas, to be circulated among citizens of our own and other southern States; and further, to correspond freely by letter, with all persons of these States who may be desirous of information upon this subject.

Resolved, That we most earnestly call upon our fellow-citizens of Buchanan, Platte, Clay, and all border and western counties of Missouri, to meet and organize, and to follow up their organization by action, that we may meet and repel the wave of fanaticism which threatens to break upon our border, and that we pledge ourselves to co-operate with them in all necessary measures for our common protection.

Resolved, That we recommend to all our fellow-citizens who have a will to remove to Kansas, and to all others who feel with them a common interest in the protection of their rights and property to meet in general convention at Fort Leavenworth, or some other suitable place in the Territory, and to arrange for their mutual and common protection, against all interference with their rights.

"Is thy Servant a Dog?"

The reply of Senator Sumner the other day, to a question put to him in debate, whether he would aid in the capture of a fugitive slave,—"Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" This reply, which no other thought or words could equal in trenchant sarcasm and classical brevity, brought down upon him yesterday a storm of invective from the Southern faction of the Senate. To this general attack, Senator Sumner answered in a speech, of which we give an abstract. The speech is worthy of the inspired text which was the occasion of it. Even in the abridged form in which we give it, it is a comprehensive, crushing exposition of constitutional truth, as eloquent in temper and expression, as it is sound in doctrine. The public mind much needs illumination on the obligations assumed to be imposed upon citizens by the Fugitive Slave Law. After all that has been said on the subject by the advocates of freedom, the remarks of Mr. Sumner appear to us to prevent some features of the question in a new light. We feel quite sure that any honest Northern man, who may as yet waver as to the degree of respect due to the Act, which couples him with blood-hounds to hunt down humanity, will no longer have a doubt of his duty, legal as well as moral, when he shall read the speech of Mr. Sumner on the subject.—Philadelphia Daily Register.

SPEECH OF MR. SUMNER.

In the debate yesterday in the Senate, on the Boston petition for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law, Mr. Mallory referred to Mr. Sumner as disavowing any obligation imposed by his oath to support the Constitution. Mr. Sumner corrected him, saying: I said I recognised no obligation upon me to help to return or reduce to slavery any man.

Mr. Clay, of Ala., insisted that Mr. Sumner did make the remark imputed to him, and that the qualification put on the declaration by the interpolation in the report was an afterthought, and done to shrink from and avoid the responsibility of appearing to the world as a man having desecrated the Senate chamber with his presence and the Holy Evangelists with his lips. He said that though the law would not reach such a person, the Senate could treat him with disdain, deny to him all those civilities and courtesies common among gentlemen—make him feel that he is treated as a leper and avoided as a venomous reptile.

Mr. Sumner said—Since I had the honor of addressing the Senate yesterday, various Senators have spoken, and several have alluded to me in terms clearly beyond the sanction of parliamentary debate. Of this I make no complaint. If to them it seems proper, courteous, parliamentary, "to unpack the heart with words, and fall a cursing like a very drab—a scullion," I will not interfere in the enjoyment which they find in such exposure of themselves.—They have certainly shown character. Two of thiem, the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Virginia, who sit immediately behind me, are not young; their heads are amply covered by time. They did not speak from any ebullition of youth, but from the confirmed temper of age.

I think, sir, that I am not the only person on this floor who, in listening to them in this debate—these two self-confident champions of the peculiar fanaticism of the South—was reminded of the striking words of Jefferson picturing the influence of slavery. "The whole commerce," said he, "between master and slave, is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions; the most unremitting disposition on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it, for man is an imitative animal. The parent storms, the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, give loose to his worst passions; and thus nursed and educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot be but stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can restrain his manners and manliness undepraved by such circumstances." No person who has witnessed the Senator from S. C. and the Senator from Va. in this debate, will place them among the prodigies described by Mr. Jefferson As they spoke, the Senate Chamber must have seemed to their sight a plantation stocked with slaves, over which the lash of the overseer had free scope. There was little which fell from them deserves reply, certainly not the hard words they used so readily. The Senator from Virginia complained that I had characterised a person who went from Virginia to Boston in pursuit of a slave as a "slave-hunter." Sir, I choose to call things by their right names,—white I call white, and black I call black. A man who degrades himself to the work of chasing a poor negro, who, under the inspiration of freedom and the guidance of the North Star, has sought a freeman's home far away from the whip of the overseer, I call a slave hunter. If the Senator will give me any term which more precisely describes such a person, I will use it.

The Senator from South Carolina asks if there is any dog in the Constitution? He does not seem to think that by the interpretation he has given to the Constitution, he has helped to nurture there a regular South Carolina blood-hound, or even any dog in the Constitution of the United States.

He then quoted Gen. Jackson in his veto of the Bank of the United States, when the authority of the Supreme Court was opposed to his course, to the effect that—the Congress, the Executive, and the Court must, each for itself, be guided by its own opinion of the Constitution, each public officer, who takes an oath to support the Constitution, swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others.

Mr. S. continued—Mark these words: Each public officer who takes an oath to support the Constitution, swears that he will support it as he understands it, and not as it is understood by others. Does any Senator here dissent from this rule? Does the Senator from Virginia? Does the Senator from South Carolina? At all events, for myself, I accept the rule as just and reasonable. In swearing to support the Constitution, at your desk, Mr. President, I did not swear to support it as you understood it, as the Senator from Virginia understood it, or as the Senator from South Carolina understood it, with a blood hound, or at least a dog, in it, pawing to get free his hinder parts in pursuit of a slave. No such thing sir, I swore to support it as I understood it.

He insisted that the clause in the Constitution, assuming it to apply to fugitive slaves, does not impel me to any personal obligation; especially it does not impose upon me any obligation to render any personal assistance in the surrender of a fugitive slave. As a Senator, I have taken the oath to support the Constitution as I understand it; and understanding it as I do, I am bound by my oath to oppose all enactments by Congress on the subject as a flagrant violation of the Constitution; especially must I oppose the last act as a tyrannical temptation. Here my duties as a Senator, under the oath which I have taken, end. In no respect, by my oath as a Senator, can I be constrained to duties in other capacities, or as a simple citizen, which are revolting to my conscience, even though required by positive enactments. Now, in this interpretation of the Constitution I may be wrong; others may differ from me and will act according to their understanding. For myself, I shall act according to mine. On this statement of my constitutional obligations I stand, and to the inquiry whether I would render any personal assistance in surrendering a fellow man to bondage, I reply again, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" And, sir, looking round upon this Senate, I might ask, fearlessly, how many there are in this body, if indeed there is a single Senator, who would stoop to any such service? Until some one rises and openly confesses his willingness to become a slave hunter, I will not believe there can be one And yet, honorable and chivalrous Senators have been prompt to judge me because I openly declared my abhorrence of a service at which every manly bosom must revolt. Sir, I have found in Bayonne, brave soldiers and good citizens, but not one executioner, was the noble reply of the Governor of that place to Charles IX. of France, when he ordered the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and such a spirit, I think, will yet animate the people of this country, when pressed to the service of dogs.

The debate was continued at great length. At the close Mr. Toucey desired that the Senator would now state whether he recognised any obligations imposed by the Constitution to return a fugitive slave?

Mr. Sumner—To which question I answer emphatically "No!"

The motion to refer the petition was agreed to, and the Senate adjourned.

The Foreign Slave Trade.

The Times has published a report from the Committee of Foreign Relations of the Senate—presented to that body, by Mr. Slidell, in secret session—recommending the abrogation of that Article of the Ashburton treaty which binds the United States to keep a naval force on the coast of Africa for the suppression of the Slave Trade. The Committee assert that the African squadron has done little if any good, having captured only 14 vessels, while it has had a tendency to increase the vigilance of the traders, and thereby the cruelties inflicted upon the victims. They disclaim any intention of relaxing in any degree the stringency of our legislation on the subject of the Slave trade, but they would leave the Executive at liberty to withdraw the squadron from the African coast, and employ it in the vicinity of Cuba and Porto Rico, where they think it would act more efficiently. This sounds well, but we suspect there is a cat under the meal.

Mr. Clayton, however, has presented to the Senate a bill, which, if it shall pass, will add not a little to the stringency of the laws against the Slave Trade. It provides that whenever any American registered ship or vessel shall, in whole or in part, be sold to a citizen of the United States, at any foreign port or place in North or South America, in West Indies, in Cape de Verde Islands, or on or near the coast of Africa, the bill of sale shall be utterly void, unless it shall be executed in the presence of the Minister or Consul of the United States, and shall contain an express condition that such sale shall not be valid in case such vessel shall make a voyage to Africa before returning to the United States and obtaining a new register. Any citizen of the United States who shall sell any such vessel, knowing that she is to be employed in the African Slave Trade, or that she is to visit the Coast of Africa before returning to the United States, or shall charter such a vessel for such a voyage, shall, on conviction thereof in any United States Court, be fined ten thousand dollars and be imprisoned for three years. Every charter of an American vessel at any such foreign port, with the intent that such vessel shall be employed in the Slave Trade, and every sale of an American vessel on the Coast of Africa, unless she be duly condemned as unseaworthy, shall be illegal and void.

Help the Fugitives.

Fugitives from southern injustice are coming thick and fast. The underground railroad never before did so large a business as it is doing now. The Vigilance Committee have their hands full, and all they want is the pecuniary means to meet the demands made upon them. This is a matter that of course cannot be made the subject of much public remark. A word to the wise is sufficient. The members of the Acting Committee are Wm. Still, 31 N. 5th st; N. W. Dupee, 334 South st; Jacob C. White, 100 Old York Road, and Passmore Williamson, S. W. corner of Seventh and Arch streets. Any money placed in the hands of either of these gentlemen, or forwarded to Charles Wise, corner of 5th and Market streets, Treasurer of the Vigilance Committee, will be secure of a faithful and a judicious appropriation.—Pa. Freeman.

From the London Morning Advertiser.

At the recent meeting of the Anti-Slavery Society, a subject was introduced to the notice of the assembly which is of deep interest to this country, as in addition to the claims it has on us as the advocates of freedom for all men, it appeals to our patriotism or rather to our right to see that justice is done to our fellow-subjects, and that they are not injured by the operations of the iniquitous enactments of the slave-owner.

We have, on a former occasion referred to the outrage committed on British subjects from Canada, when they reach the various ports of South Carolina and Georgia in the capacity of seamen, and being the free subjects of Queen Victoria, are guilty of nothing which ought to give offence to the governments of these two States, except the crime of having a sable skin and an African origin.

Vessels entering these States, whether for commerce, or being driven into port by stress of weather, are immediately visited by the local officials and searched, to discover if any men of color are on board, who, as soon as they are found, are seized, and carried away to the common gaol, where they are kept until the vessel departs. It appears that about thirty cases occur every year, in which our fellow-subjects are thus treated, and the honour of England outraged. In South Carolina it is stated that this legislation is carried out with unmitigated severity. In 1851, thirty-seven British subjects were thus seized and incarcerated, and in 1852 the number so treated amounted to forty-two.

One of the aggravating circumstances connected with this case is, that the officers by whom these infamous proceedings are conducted have a pecuniary interest in them, and from the statements made by the Anti-Slavery Society, it appears that the Federal Government would prefer seeing this enormity brought to an end; and if the two States in which it is practised would be disposed to terminate the iniquity, there is still one difficulty which cannot very easily be overcome, arising from the fact that these captures and incarcerations are found very profitable to the officials, the captors, the jailors, and the officers of the court, who represent the majesty of law on these occasions. The report prepared for the Attorney-General of South Carolina by the warden of the jail shows how every one of the captured British subjects brings a grist to the mill of that worthy functionary, whose pockets are greatly replenished at the expense of his victims. The very lowest sum that every man so brought within his clutches, is mulcted in, is nine dollars, which, multiplied by 63, gives for one year 567 dollars. It appears, from some of the accounts, that the sole object of perpetuating these indignities is to put fees into the pockets of the sheriffs and wardens. A person who seems perfectly to understand the secrets of the prison house says:—"Take away the fees; the mercantile community will not murmur, and the official gentry will neither amuse or trouble themselves about enforcing the law to imprison free men." That is, in other words, the Governments of South Carolina and Georgia allow their myrmidons the privilege of arresting British subjects, and squeezing out of them any fees and profits they can make as their perquisites, for which, of course, if this system were brought to an end, these much injured officials would be entitled to compensation quite as much as the worthy vergers of St. Paul's for the twopences they lose by the admission of the people into the walls of their own church.

To complete the description of this piece of iniquity and of the violation of international law, it should be added that if the persons so seized cannot pay the fees, as is frequently the case, and if the owners are not willing to pay them, these British subjects are sold into slavery, in order that the officials may not be the losers. And in consequence there are now British subjects sold into all the horrors of slavery in these States. A coloured man, one of our fellow-subjects, who sailed from Liverpool, is one of the last among the victims of this infamous law, and that man is now held in cruel bondage for no offence, while his wife is somewhere in this country, we believe in Liverpool, and both of them subjects of the British Government.

When we remonstrate on this subject with the Federal Government, we are told that the matter is one which it cannot entertain, as it is purely local, belonging only to the States, with whose laws and institutions the Central Government cannot interfere. Then when we attempt to obtain from these States some degree of justice for our fellow-subjects, it appears that they cannot as separate States treat with a foreign power, so that we are bandied about from Washington to Charlestown, and from Charlestown to Washington, without any prospect of obtaining redress from one or the other.

We hope, therefore, by calling the attention of the country and of our Government to this important question, some action will be taken by which our fellow-subjects, being free men, will be allowed to visit the ports of South Carolina and Georgia with impunity, and by which all the British subjects, now held in durance in the jails of those States, will be immediately liberated. Surely it is in the power of this country to protect its subjects from false imprisonment, and the flag of England from the vile insult to which it is thus constantly exposed. One of the journals of Charleston, in which these abominable proceedings are conducted, is obliged in candour to acknowledge that the thing is too bad. That journal describes the law as "offensive to foreigners, unwise and impolitic;" and, after such an admission, there cannot be much difficulty in obtaining from the two States in question the abrogation of a law, which cannot be justified even by their own political organ, one which, considering its locale, cannot be suspected of any anti-slavery sympathies.

STAMPEDE OF NEGROES.—Forty negroes, out of fifty, employed by one of the contractors on the Clarksville and Ridgway Railroad, ran off last Sunday week, and have not since been heard from. Good!

British America.

The subjects of her Britannic Majesty will no doubt affirm that there is "a North!"

Look at the map of North America. Off to the northwest there is a comparatively small region of cold and sterile country, about 700 miles square which belongs to Russia. Still farther northward, on the east, are Greenland and Iceland. Excepting these, all the vast regions of country north of the United States belong to Great Britain, and are called British America. They consist of four million square miles of territory, or nearly three-fourth of a million more than our States and Territories!

The improved and organized portions of the territory consist of—

	Square miles.	Population
Canada - -	400,000	1,842,864
New Brunswick -	28,000	200,000
Nova Scotia -	19,000	300,000
Prince Edw'd Island	2,000	75,000
Newfoundland -	57,000	100,000
	1[illegible]0	2[illegible]7,8[illegible]

These countries are important in extent of territory and in population, but they are great also in their navagable rivers and lakes, in their extent of seacoast, in their natural resources of forest, minerals, and agriculture, in the ships they posses, in their imports and exports, in their revenue, in their ratio of increase, in their intelligence and love of freedom, in the size of their cities, and in all their social characteristics.

And what is the political condition of regions so interesting! Each Province has a Governor and Council, appointed by the Queen of Great Britain, and a local elected Legislature of very limited powers, the whole thing being subject to a Captain General appointed by the Crown. These appointed officers are not natives of the Provinces, and the Provinces have no representatives in the British Parliament, which legislates for them.

Are they satisfied with this condition of things? They assuredly are not. Their dissatisfaction is deep and universal. It is not angry or rebellious. Resentments toward the mother country have not been excited. The feeling toward her is that of respect, affection and gratitude. Yet are the Provinces not ignorant of their great disabilities and privations. They speak feelingly of them, and quaintly enough of their wish to be annexed to their mother country—thus indicating their desire to become an integral portion of the realm, as new States become an integral portion of this Republic, and to be admitted to representation in the Imperial Parliament, and to a national existence. If this is not allowed them—as, indeed it is not—they have alternative desires. These are—

1st. Annexation to the United States.

2nd. The formation of a kingdom or confederation of their own.

To the former there are some objections, one of which we cited yesterday, in an extract from a speech of Hon. Joseph Howe, Secretary of the Province of Nova Scotia, wherein he avowed its determined purpose to never lend itself to the support of the institution of Slavery.

To the latter, important impediments are also offered, chiefly in the inaccessibleness of the different Provinces to each other, from the want of railroads and other improvements. We are of opinion, however, that some of these obstacles will ere long be removed, and that a new political existence will be entered upon by these interesting Provinces. What that existence shall be, time and its events alone can determine. C.

Terrible Murder.

On Monday evening about 9 o'clock, a man stopped two boys on Longworth near Plum street, and offered to pay them if they would carry a small package he held in his hand, to Mr. Allison, the Steward of the Hospital, at the same time cautioning the boys not to shake the box, else they might damage something which the box contained. The boys took the box and left it at O. Stockton's agents furnishing store, on the corner of Western Row and Longworth streets, with one of Mr. Stockton's clerks. The box was wrapped in brown paper and tied with a cord. Under the string was a card on which was written "Mr. Allison, Marine Hospital, corner of Western Row and Longworth streets, Cincinnati."

The clerk took the box and gave it to Dr. John W. Baker, who was seated at the door of his office, situated in the same building. Dr. B. was requested to hand the box to Mr. Allison, the steward. Dr. Baker was not going up stairs immediately, and laid the box on the table until he had prepared a caustic for a patient. Mrs. Allison took the box and went into her room, and gave the box to her husband, who sat down on a chair, and after untieing the strings and taking off the paper, he commenced pulling out the sliding top of the box, and an explosion took place. The Dr. Baker, hearing the report, supposed it was first thunder; then an explosion of gas. They heard the ceiling falling, the walls trembling, and screams in the room. Upon entering the room, filled with dust of the plaster, and smoke of the powder, they discovered the bed clothes to be on fire, and also the clothes on Mrs. Allison. Dr. Baker tore the burning clothes off her person, and stuffed them up the chimney, and by the aid of water they succeeded in extinguishing the fire. Dr. Baker then heard his name called by Mr. Allison and his wife, two or three times,—the former piteously, and the latter crying loudly, "For God's sake, Dr. come and help me!" As soon as a light was procured, Mr. A. was seen creeping along to a front window on his hands and knees, his entrails protruding from his abdomen, and his clothes burning. He was picked up and carried into a room adjoining, and Mrs. A. taken to a room in the first story. When laid on his couch, Mr. A. asked Dr. Baker, "Can I live?" and was answered "No." Several physicians were sent for, who rendered prompt and efficient assistance. Allison was asked, "What done this?" He replied, "A torpedo." Allison received twenty-two balls, slug-shots and pieces of iron in his legs, and a wound of about three inches in his abdomen. His hands and face were dreadfully burnt, and it was said that both his eyes were burnt out. While the physicians were administering to his wants he was heard to exclaim, "Great God! why is this? I have never done wrong to a human being!" and soon after he named a person who he suspected of the planning of the diabolical act. (The name we forbear mentioning at present.) The explosion occurred at precisely 22 minutes past 10 o'clock; and after suffering intense pain about two hours and a quarter, Mr. A. died in great agony, at half-past twelve o'clock, perfectly conscious to the last. Mrs. Allison had one arm badly torn, and which was amputated. The other hand, and her face, shoulder, and breast were dreadfully burnt. Although so badly injured, she nevertheless retained her senses, and frequently conversed as to how the accident occurred. Her face and shoulders are perfectly black, and her eyes are burnt, but to what extent is not known. Her person generally is very much mutilated. She was living during the day yesterday, but her physicians say that she cannot possibly recover. Mr. A. and wife are both young, without children, and have relations in Kentucky and in this city.

The jury returned a verdict of "Came to his death by twenty-two wounds in his legs and a cut of three inches in length in the abdomen, received by the explosion of a combustible, contained in a box, and inflicted by a person or persons unknown to the jury."

Death of Mrs. Allison—Traces of the Murderer.

Mrs. Allison died yesterday afternoon, about half-past 2 o'clock, in great agony. A coroner's inquest was held, and a verdict was found similar to the one returned on the inquest over Mr. Allison. The funeral of both will take place at half-past 2 o'clock, this afternoon.

It is almost a settled fact that Marshal Ruffin and Capt. Hoke have traced through a chain of circumstances, the murderer of Mr. and Mrs. Allison, who is no other than a young Physician of this city, named Wm. H. Arrison. Information was conveyed to Mr. Ruffin that a man called, on Wednesday afternoon at C. F. Hall's, Fourth street, between Main and Walnut, and requested of the clerk, Mr. Samuel Robinson, pen and ink. He had a card in his hand, and dipping the pen into the ink, made some excuse as to his inability to write, and asked Mr. Robinson to write on the card, "Mr. J. H. Allison, Marine Hospital, corner of Longworth and Western Row." Mr. R. complied, and the man remained in the store several minutes conversing upon the cholera. He appeared nervous and left the store hastily.

We published an account of the discovery as to where the box was manufactured. This was at Messrs. McCulloch & Hively's, Fifth street, and also as to a man purchasing powder at Stilsbury's drugstore. The description of the man as given by the carpenters, the druggist, Mr. Robinson, and the two boys who received the box, and a lady who saw the box handed to the boys, correspond precisely to the description of Arrison.

Arrison was acting in the capacity of house apothecary and assistant surgeon at the Marine Hospital, during the temporary absence of young Dr. Baker, when the difficulty between Allison and him took place. It occurred about changing and putting away of some medicine cups, and ended in Allison knocking Arrison down. This was about four weeks previous to the horrible affair. Dr. A. left the Hospital the same day, and afterwards borrowed a pistol from an acquaintance, stating that he intended to kill rats. He returned it, however, in about a week, saying that he had no further use for it.

On the Thursday previous to the murder, he left his boarding-house, saying that he was going home to his parents; but on the night of the murder, he was seen by a person who knew him, at a hotel, sitting in the reading room. This was between 9 and 10 o'clock. The time the boy received the box was about half-past 8. Arrison has not been heard of since that night, and every effort thus far to find him, has proved unavailing.

"Cannuck's" Letter Again.

MY DEAR CANNUCK:—I am neither blessed with so much modesty, nor doomed to such affectation, as not to be sensible of the very high compliment you pay me in your letter in No. 6. I sincerely wish I better deserved your encomiums, and those of my very, very few other real friends.

But the public ought to know that much of my usefulness in Canada depended upon yourself. They should know that you, and a few such friends as yourself, stimulated me to great exertions, by your kind words, and, if possible, kinder deeds; and I beg to return your compliments, by saying in this manner, that arriving among you an exile, a bankrupt, at the commencement of a most rigid winter, you, and a few like you, relieved me from anxiety; introduced me to those who gave me employment, and, many a time, rendered me assistance which made the sternness of winter, to me, and those dear ones, who are more to me than my own life, a season of pleasantness and hope.

Next to pleasing my God has been the wish that I might do something which, such practical friends as yourself, should recognise as useful to our cause and our people. I now confess, that I have been not a little anxious, lest in this desire, I should be misunderstood and mis-interpreted,—not by the giddy multitude, nor by those who cared not what became of me, so that I should not do too well,—but by those to whom I was under obligations, and who were both kind and patriotic enough to take what I might be enabled, by the blessing of God, to do for my people, as their best reward for their personal kindness to me.

I knew that I had many faults. I knew, that I possessed not a tithe of the power which is, even by yourself, constantly attributed to me; and for which, you and others, hold me (I must say unjustly) responsible. I knew, that among my defects, was the utter inability to attract and conciliate, so that I have no power of making friends, nor converting enemies.

I knew as well that I left behind me some of the deepest, most malignant, most relentless, enemies that a man ever had.

All of this, I now publicly admit for the first time; and with the burden of all this upon me, I came a stranger to this country, quickly followed by a paragraph in Mr. Frederick Douglass' Paper—the animus of which, was unmistakably hostile, and as unmistakably characteristic. No black man ever came to this country in like circumstances.

But here I am! And now my public career is before the world! That would have been all I should have allowed to go to the public, concerning my sojourn in Britain: but for your letter. I now shall feel emboldened to say in future letters, some things which, if you will, I shall call "My Impressions of Britain," through the columns of this paper, and nowhere else. And I beg to add, that if after my return to Canada, I shall keep steadily in view the great objects to which my past life has been devoted, and whatever observations I shall make shall be at your service, though the same medium.

I may be allowed to say, that I have arrived at that time of life when one feels the need of seeking for those dependent upon him, some more certain, and more lucrative means of providing for "rainy days," than travelling agencies are. And indeed, the continuance of my life and health are already jeopardised by the severity, and the variety of labours to which I have been devoting my energies for the past 15 years.

These are the circumstances, in connexion with one or two others of a private character, that made it a duty to say at first, and to repeat now, that all I can do for the Freeman is to write for it. In doing this gratis, I do it for that sort of pay, which, if not the surest, is certainly the best earned.

I am, my dear Cannuck,

Your obedient servant,

SAMUEL RINGGOLD WARD

Bradford, Yorkshire, 30th May. 1854.

The British Markets.

What a pity it is that Canadian farmers do not pay more attention to supplying the markets of Great Britain with the great Canadian staples which are in constant demand in the mother country, and at the most remunerative prices! Wheat, flax, maize, wool, and timber, can be produced in indefinite, we had almost said infinite quantities in Canada; and in Britain there is a constant demand for them at high prices, and yet there is next to none of any of those commodities to be met with in British markets from Canada.

Mr. J. D. Tinsley.

This gentleman was with me in London, in February last, having arrived from Australia, in the Great Britain. He was to have taken the Cunard steamer for Boston, (thence to Canada,) on the 25th of February; but he waited till the 1st of March, and took the City of Glasgow, which, alas! has not since been heard from.

☞ It will be seen that we give a letter and other matter from Mr. Ward, in the present number. Henceforth, correspondence and matter editorial, so far as Mr. W. who is 3000 miles off can give them, may be regularly looked for by our readers from him. We are pleased to give them this assurance, as it will leave us time for business in the West, connected with the paper, which we must attend to immediately.

Prepare to subscribe, friends, and not friends, and get up a few meetings. We will visit you. "Meetings"?—yes, do not be frightened, timid people will not get hurt, even.

The Coming Elections.

The Kent Advertiser, speaking of Mr. Larwill, of "Petition" notoriety, and who now modestly offers himself as a candidate for Parliament, says:—"In our own County, acting no doubt upon the principle that in politics as, well as in war, one should always be the first in the field, Mr. Edwin Larwill, who contested the last election with Messrs. Brown and Rankin, has again issued the first address to the Electors, which appeared in the Planet, on Wednesday last, and which will be seen in our own columns of to-day. His address is a short one, but perhaps the brevity is the best of it, for he does not seem to have particularly touched upon one of the great subjects now before the country. He says he is Conservative, Liberal, Tolerant, which, being interpreted, we suppose means any, and was intended by the writer to mean and tickle everything. He says, however, that his political views remain unchanged, and, fortunately, we have had the gentleman before the County on one or two occasions heretofore, so that we are not without a pretty good clue to what his political principles are at present. If we are to take him at his word, and judge him from his antecedents, both as a candidate for parliamentary honors and as formerly a writer for the public press, we must set him down, as he undoubtedly is, a thorough-paced Tory, and likely to vote with that party on all great political questions."

The point is not with us whether he is a Tory or Reformer—is he the man to whom honest coloured men can give their suffrages? Does he not love the "creature" too well for those who mourn over the desolation made by the liquor traffic, to hope for any opposition to it from him? Does he not hate negroes too thoroughly for coloured voters to expect anything but opposition? It matters not how smoothly he talks—for he can talk "beautifully" to negroes, too. Men making greater pretensions to perfection can and do talk glibbly enough when they intend to act differently. We would not trust the interests of a pig constituency in his hands—who is so accommodating, so liberal, so tolerant, that he cannot endure the presence of coloured men! Who has done more to poison the minds of the people of Kent against you than this same Mr. Larwill? Who has counselled ignorant black men in school matters, and aided stupidity to fetter the minds of your children for the last eight years equal to this would-be member? And does he give evidence of changé for the better? No, the same gum-elastic-like pliancy in the general—the same detestable policy for you, coloured men. Is Mr. Waddel an honest man and a gentleman—not drunk three-fourths of the time, and seven-eighths of the other fourth? Does he have a decent regard for you and your interests? (He need not give over-many assurances of love for the "coloured race".) Should he be a candidate, though a Reformer, vote not against him; he will be the safer of the two.

James Boulton, Esq., of this city, it will be seen, offers himself as an independent candidate for the public suffrage. We have heard him spoken of as an honest and liberal-minded gentleman. Should the measures he proposes to support, meet the favour of any of our readers, they could not, we are persuaded, confide them to better hands.

We speak not of the merits of the respective measures proposed, but of the fitness of men to carry out any measures that may be of public utility; and as the candidates hereabouts, are all Conservative, and as some of you will vote, select those you think most worthy.

Mr. Bowes, is another candidate, but against him objections may be made by some on the score of the Debenture speculation. All we are at liberty to say, at present, is, that your votes will be wanted, for great favours shown you by men who have not speculated because the opportunity has not offered, and who can give no greater guarantee of fitness than Mr. Bowes. Is he sound on other questions?—we doubt if your sober second thought will make that a material objection, especially as men are fleecing you in other matters every day, to a far greater extent, and, insisting at the same time that you should be grateful for it. *

The late Storm.

A violent storm visited this city on Tuesday last. Trees were blown up by the roots, sheds unroofed, awnings torn away, and other damage done premises, though not of a serious nature. The little steamer Queen was blown ashore on the Island, though no one sustained any injury, so far as we have been able to learn.

The Pennsylvania Freeman will henceforth be combined with the Anti-Slavery Standard.

Correspondence.

Pat and the Safety Valve.

To the Provincial Freeman:

A few weeks since, a labourer in the employ of Cutler & Co., Buffalo, was placed in charge of the Steam Engine, during the brief absence of the engineer. Our hero was soon zealously engaged in the fireing-up process; but perceiving the rebellious boiler much disposed to mutter and scream at his new taskmaster,—Och and sure, thought pat, but I'll soon stop your mouth (as he wedged in a brick between a beam over the Boiler at the extreme end of the lever that capped the safety valve.) In another moment he was firing up with the zeal of an Archimedes when the foreman luckily popped in and saved the building from being blown to atoms—Poor silly fool! Nay, not the only fool, for if the Nebraska Brick is not speedily removed from the mouth of the oppressed black, America will soon produce a host of such fools, or else Poor Joe is no Prophet.

Buffalo, June 28, 1854.

Summary.

Marked Kindness.—It is seldom, in the use of public conveyances, that we find anything to commend in the treatment we receive at the hands of those in authority.—One may usually be thankful while travelling, especially upon Lake Steamboats, if he performs a trip without gross insult and abuse. A clear exception to the general rule of proscription happened to us while crossing the other day from Toronto to Lewiston. The beautiful and swift-winged steamer "Peerless," (for such she truly is,) bore us over the lake not only without insult, but without charge. The price of a ticket is not much, but the good-will and kindness shown in remitting it, are worthy of grateful mention, as one of the signs of the times, and as creditable to the Commander. We sensibly felt the presence of the British flag waving over us, as we passed from the north to the south shores of Ontario.—F. Douglass' Paper.

The above is altogether different from a statement made of the Peerless in this paper, by our correspondent "Elevator," not long since. The public should know both sides. *

Designs of the Americans.—Some of the Americans are making a most extraordinary proposition, which we scarcely think can be seriously entertained. They observe that Russia possesses very extensive territories at the North Western extremity of this Continent, and to the north of the Oregon, extending to Behring's Straits and the Arctic Sea. This territory is of some, though not of very much value, for furs. It is only defended by two weak forts on the seacoast, who have no hunters of their own, but buy the peltries from the savages. It is observed, that the first thing Great Britain will do, will be to send an expedition to seize them, and to annex the territory to the Hudson's Bay Company. This is not improbable, or the French may do the same if they like; but then both powers are at open war with Russia. The modest and honest proposition is, that, to prevent this, the government of the United States should, itself, seize the territory, and annex it to the Union. The disturbed state of Europe seems to have encouraged the 'filibusters,' as they are called, to make greater preparations for an attack upon Cuba; and it is generally believed that they are countenanced by some persons in high places. Thanks to steam communication, the Spanish Government is fully aware of this, and has despatched six thousand land forces, and a fleet of thirteen steamers to watch the coast. There is a general feeling in Europe, that next to the Czar, the arrogant ambition of the States must be put a stop to. It is understood that both France and England have agreed to guarantee Cuba to Spain. They do not wish to see the United States, by an unprincipled robbery, take the command of the whole Antilles. Spain has quite enough forces there now. But France is fitting out additional ships at Cherbourg; and England, notwithstanding her already floating armaments, is collecting another large fleet at Plymouth.—Montreal Transcript.

More Fires!—Since our last issue, no less than four fires have taken place in Toronto. A stable, adjoining McClean's Hotel, Front Street, was consumed on Friday evening: two houses were burned on Sunday morning, opposite to the Asylum; and on Monday night, two fires occurred at the same time—one breaking out in Boyd's Hotel, Front-st., a few feet from the scene of conflagration on Friday night,—burning the hotel and stables, also Rolph's stable and seven horses. The other on Spadina Avenue, consuming a house. Many of the citizens believe that these fires are the work of incendiaries. It seems as if a band of scoundrels are prowling about the city, resolved to burn and plunder the property of the citizens. In the midst of these alarming events, our City Council takes no action, and does not even form a quorum for business. —North American.

☞ The body of a child was found on Sunday last floating in the River Don, clothed in some very fine apparel. The clothes were exposed for public view on Monday, and on the evening of that day the jury returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder, by some party or parties unknown."—Ibid.

Information Wanted.—We have been requested to publish the following, by the afflicted father of the girl alluded to, and would respectfully request our exchanges to copy the paragraph:

"Left her home, North Augusta, Canada West, on the 5th day of May last, about eleven o'clock A. M., a young girl, about eighteen years of age, rather stout, and of medium height, of mild appearance and countenance, with light blue eyes, and lightish coloured hair. When she left home she wore a dark printed calico dress, brown silk cape trimmed with black gimp, brown silk bonnet lined with pink, strings of black and red placid ribbon, and green veil. The whole dress partly worn. Any person giving information of said girl to D. Wylie, Esq., Brockville Recorder Office, will confer a great favour on the bereaved parents. Constables, or other observing men, will be fully compensated for their information or trouble."—North American.

Presentation to Mr. Hayes.—A large audience assembled in the Tremont Temple, in Boston, on Monday evening, to witness the presentation of a silver salver and a purse of two hundred dollars to Mr. Joseph K. Hayes, the ex-Captain of Police, who so nobly resigned his office rather than assist in the rendition of Burns. Charles M. Ellis, Esq., made an eloquent presentation speech, to which Mr. Hayes responded in modest and appropriate terms. Theodore Parker and William Lloyd Garrison, being loudly called for, addressed the meeting in language which kindled a high degree of enthusiasm. Upon the salver presented to Mr. Hayes was engraved the letter in which he so nobly resigned his office rather than aid in re-enslaving a fellow-being. Massachusetts may well be proud of such a citizen.

Annexation of the Sandwich Islands.—The New York Courier has a despatch from Washington to the effect that the government of these Islands has thrown itself upon the American party for protection against French, English, and other foreign seulers; and further, that the United States Commissioner has been empowered to accept the Island and assure the government of American protection. There can be no doubt that the government of the Sandwich Islands desire to annex the country to the United States, and their desires will soon be realized, but the statement of the Courier's correspondent must be regarded as premature.—Rochester Union.

Delia Webster Again.—Delia Webster, the female Abolitionist, who has been several times arraigned in Kentucky on the charge of aiding in the escape of slaves, (she was once sent to the penitentiary, and after remaining there some time, was pardoned out by Gov. Crittenden) was arrested last week on an old indictment. The warrant found her 'so very sick that she could not be removed' from her lodgings, and a guard of three men was selected to remain, tend and watch her. One of the papers says the guard 'slept at their posts, or were careless, or were seduced,'—at any rate, Miss Webster escaped, on some secret branch of the underground railroad—leaving the guard to watch an empty house. It is said a party of men from the other side of the State line in Indiana, were her rescuers—they having suddenly crossed over into Kentucky for the purpose, and escaped the vigilance of the guard. She appears to have very suddenly recovered her health.

Frightful Tragedy.—A terrible tragedy occurred at Millville, Massachusetts, on Saturday night. Alexander Hewitt, in a fit of jealousy, shot his own wife and a man named Owen Brown, to whose house she had fled for protection. He then committed suicide by taking strychnine. Brown died instantly. Mrs. Hewett still lingers, but cannot live.

Muskets and Spades—A Contrast—The U. S. army numbers about 10,000 men, who cost the country last year $8,525,240 for pay, subsistence, clothing, &c. The Illinois Central Railroad army numbers 10,000 men, who receive from the company $3,700,000 per annum. In three years they will make 700 miles of road, adding greatly to the wealth of the State and country. In thirty years, the United States have spent $200,000,000, for which they have nothing to show but some old forts, guns, battered uniforms, and demoralized veterans. —Exchange paper.

A fire broke out in Philadelphia during last night, (July 6,) raging with great fury all night, and was not got under until Walker's Circus, Chinese Museum, and thirty or forty buildings were destroyed. The buildings were situated on Chesnut, George, Eighth and Ninth Streets. The Girard House was on fire several times, and narrowly escaped destruction. Loss $250,000.

Advices from Barbadoes to the 15th have been received. The cholera is raging awfully at that place—deaths averaging 400 a day. Total number of deaths thus far is five thousand.

A dreadful railway accident has occured within 5 miles of Baltimore, on the 4th of July. The Excursion train, met the usual passenger train, and a frightful loss of life ensued. Twenty-four dead bodies have been already recovered from the mass of wounded passengers, and 100 more seriousinjured, many of whom are not expected to survive. The Excursion train contained 2000 persons.

Shipwrecks—Rum.

It is generally known that a portion—we apprehend but a minor portion—of the vessels from time to time sent to sea are fitted out on the principle of total abstinence from intoxicating liquors, while the residue are supplied with alcoholic beverages, and officered by drinking men. The public as well as the underwriters in knowing how many of the shipwrecks, of late so frequent and so disastrous, are experienced by the total abstinence vessels aforesaid, and what is the per centage, of disasters occurring to these as compared with that encountered by others, it is the plain duties of the insurance companies to institute the enquiry indicated, to make it as thorough as possible, and to report and act upon the result.

A friend who has followed the sea for the last five years, giving attention to this subject, is confident that no vessel sailed on strict temperance principles has yet been lost within these five years. We consider this too strong; yet the simple truth, could it be ascertained, would be startling. Our friend says, a searching inquiry into the circumstances under which shipwrecked vessels were severally lost, would trace these calamities to liquor in more than half the cases of their occurrence. In one case which came within his knowledge, where a merchantman was wrecked on a recent fourth of July, the captain, officers and crew were all drunk, and there was not even a lookout on deck when the ship, through sheer, criminal negligence, was stranded and lost.—Tribune.

Rum and Pauperism.

The annual report of the statistics of pauperism made to the Legislature of the State of New York, by the Secretary of State, places the total expenses incurred last year for the support of paupers at the enormous figure of one million nine thousand seven hundred and forty-seven dollars! The number of paupers relieved or supported during the year was one hundred and thirty thousand and thirty-seven, of which number fifteen thousand six hundred and seventeen are reported to have been made paupers by intemperance, and fifty-eight thousand three hundred and sixty-four indigent and destitute, of which, by all previous statistics, four-fifths were caused by intemperance. The above statistics do not embrace the poor of the city of New York. If the proceeds of the seven thousand grog-shops of the city of New York be added to this number, it will be seen that more than one-half of the one million nine thousand seven hundred and forty-seven dollars contributed by the taxpayers of the State for the support of paupers is directly traceable to intemperance. And yet Gov. Seymour vetoed a law tending to dry off this prolific source of expense and evil. He was professedly very anxious to guard against any infringement of the constitution; but what were constitutions made for except to protect the lives and property, and prosperity and happiness of the people? The liquor traffic infringes all these, squanders property, destroys happiness, and takes away the lives of thousands. It is the bane of society; the greatest curse of the age.—N. Y. Organ.

ARRIVAL OF THE EUROPA.

Three Days Later News.

Breadstuffs advanced.—Silistria still holds out.—Prussia and Austria leaning westward.—Baltic Fleet near Sveaborg.

New York, June 30.

The steamer Europa arrived this evening. Flour advanced 1s.; wheat 3d.; corn dull. Important advances in breadstuffs had taken place in most of the Continental markets.

Liverpool Markets.—Liverpool Cotton market closed at a decline of 1s. 6d. a 1s. 8d. for the week; sales for the week 44,840. Corn dull at previous prices; Oats nominally at 49. Tallow less active; butter and cheese in request at full prices.

Accounts from Vienna state that it is not doubtful that Russia has rejected the Austrian summons.

The conference between the Emperor and King of Prussia had resulted satisfactorily to the allied powers. Prussia will send an envoy to St. Petersburg to support the summons already despatched thither by Austria.

Silistria still holds out against the Russians. No important battles have been fought on the Danube. The Russians have retired upon Jassy.

It has been decided that 70,000 allied troops go to Varna, and 40,000 to Sebastopol.

The report that the Turkish commander has been killed is untrue.

The English forces are encamped at Devna.

No further operations have taken place either on the Baltic or Black Sea. The allied fleets in the Baltic were before Sveaborg.

Immense exertions were making by the Turkish commanders for the relief of Silistria. The Russians in Lesser Wallachia are subjected to pillage.

The Russians are collecting forces in Finland, apparently to threaten Sweden and Norway.

Great fears respecting the crops were excited in France by continued rains, and an advance in the price of flour, wheat, and the funds, have been caused thereby.

The English transport ship Europa had been burnt at sea, with the loss of 20 lives.

Much excitement prevails at Berlin by the report that the Russians had changed their head-quarters to Jassy.

The Franklin arrived out on the 15th.

The Emperor of Austria has publicly stated that he will declare war against Russia, unless she evacuated the Principalities.

Silistria held out at our last accounts, to 14th June. From May 28th to 30th, six attempts to storm were made; all repulsed with prodigious loss. During the nights of the 28th and 30th, the Turks made sorties, and committed fearful carnage on the beseigers.

The Black Sea fleet are still engaged in conveying the Anglo-French forces to Varna; but the matter appears to progress slowly.

England.

Lord John Russell has been unanimously re-elected to his seat as member of Parliament for London.

During the debate in Parliament, the subject of granting political freedom to Canada and the North American Colonies, were strongly advocated by Lord Ellenborough and Brougham.

France.

Le Pays says the question between France and the United States, arising out of the arrest of Mr. Dillon, the French Consul at San Francisco, is settled—nothing remaining for arrangement but the form of compensation to be given.

A telegraph despatch dated Gothland, Sunday 11th, says that both the English and French fleets were at Bordsund, 20 miles from Sveaborg, and it was expected they would attack the latter place on or soon after the 13th.

Greece.

The Paris Moniteur, under date of Athens, June 8, states that intelligence from the disturbed provinces and from the Greek frontier continued satisfactory. The defeat of Karatosas, the insurgent chief in Macedonia, has been confirmed.

Reschid Pacha has temporarily retired from the ministry of foreign affairs, and his place will be filled by Faud Effendi. Reschid's retirement is nominally on account of sickness and domestic affliction.

Latest by Submarine Telegraph.

Berlin, Friday.

The Austrian and Prussian joint note in reply to the coalition, was despatched to-day.

On the 30th of May the English steamers destroyed the dockyards, and stores at Brahestadt, in N. E. Gulf of Bothnia—350,000 roubles damage was done. On the 31st the steamers captured several vessels off Sveaborg.

The loss of life by the burning of the transport Europa was Capt. Moore, Dr. Kelly, 4 sergeants, 2 privates and 1 woman of the 6th dragoons; Prince Paskiewitch was severely, wounded by a Turkish bullet, and was removed to Jassy, and Gortschakoff has temporary command.

Further News by the "Europa"

New York, July 1.

The following was received by telegraph, from London to Liverpool, on the morning of the Europa's departure:—The Times says, in a leading article on the military movements in the principalities of Wallachia and Transylvania—there is reason to believe the Emperor of Austria declared at Teschen that it was not in his power to retain his forces where they were, but they must enter Moldavia, if the questions were not settled without further delay. Scarcity of food for the Austrian troops is said to be the cause.

The report of a Greek victory in Macedonia is unfounded.

The Russians made another unsuccessful attack upon Silistria.

The English Admiral Plumridge had seized the bullion in the Finland bank.

ARRIVAL OF THE AMERICA.

Particulars of the Defeat of the Russians—Seige of Silistria raised—Decline in Wheat and Flour.

Halifax, July 5th.

The America arrived here this A. M., with Liverpool dates to the 26th.

Breadstuffs largely declined, owing to the favourable weather. Flour 2s. lower; Corn 1s. a 2s.; Wheat 3d a 6; Western Canal Flour quoted 36s. 6d, a 37s. Provisions unchanged.

The seige of Silistria has been raised; Russians defeated by the Turks and driven across the Danube. The order of events were as follows:—Seige operations were begun on the 7th of May and carried on till the 15th of June. The attack and defence were carried on incessantly and with equal bravery on both sides; repeated storming parties were directed against the intrenchments, and mines and countermines were exploded causing immense slaughter to beseigers and beseiged.

June 2.

M. Pasha, the brave Turkish commander, was killed, after which Prince Paskiewitch, the Russian commander, was struck down by a spent ball and will probably die.

June 13.

A tremendnous attack was ordered under Generals Gortschakoff and Childers, but after severe fighting they were repulsed and the Turkish brigades sent from Shumla.

The Pasha succeeded in entering the fortress there and reinforced the garrison; on the 15th made a sortie and a desperate hand to hand contest ensued, and ended in a complete discomfiture of the Russians. Prince Gortschakoff was severely wounded, and Childer had his leg shot off, and two other Generals were killed. The carnage among the Russian troops was dreadful and they retired fighting across the river.—Pursuing the advantage, the Turks crossed an arm of the river near the island of Hipa, and blew up the Russian seige works. The Turks then brought out their guns and erected temporary batteries on the bank of the river before the face of the fortress. The Russian battalions, east and west of Silistria, immediately retreated in good order, and crossed the river and destroyed their bridges behind them.

The Russians are now in the vicinity of Kalarack, awaiting reinforcements; and several detached corps are marching in haste from Salatina to join them.

This victory was gained entirely by the Turks; the French and English not having made their appearance.

The seige of Silistria thus raised, must alter the whole Russian plan of operations in Bulgravia, and consequently must change the plans of the Allies. Several ships had arrived with goods.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great humrn family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. Ward, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B Gribble, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. Thomas James, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada after effecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Poetry.

What Cowper said Sixty Years Ago.

Of the operation of the license system in England, the excellent and gifted Cowper gave, sixty years since, the following, in that genuine poetry which was the eloquence of truth," and which we cannot forbear to copy:

Pass where we may, through city or through town
Village or hamlet of this merry land,
Though lean and beggar'd, every twentieth path
Conducts the unguarded nose to such a whiff
Of stale debauch forth issuing from the sties,
That LAW HAS LICENSED, as makes temperance reel.

There sit involved and lost in curling clouds
Of Indian fume, and guzzling deep, the poor,
The lazy, and the glutton. The artificer there
Takes Lethæn leave of all his toil;
Smith, cobler, tinker, he that plies the shears,
And he that knocks the dough, all load alike,
All learned and all drunk. The fifer screams
Plaintive and piteous, as it wept and wailed
In wasted tones and harmony unheard.

Dire is the fecund curse, and its twin sound
The cock-inducing oath. 'Tis here they learn
The road that leads from competence and peace
To indigence and rapine; till at last
Society, grown weary of the load,
Shakes her encumber'd lap, and casts them out,
But censure profits little, vain the attempt
To advertise in verse a public pest,
That like the filth with which the peasant feeds
His hungry acres, stinks, and is of use.

Th' excise is fattened with the rich result
Of all this riot. Ten thousand casks,
Forever dribbling out their base contents,
Touched by the Midas finger of the state,
Bleed gold for Parliament to vote away.
Drunk and be mad, then; 'tis your country bids;
Gloriously drunk—obey the important call;
Her cause demands the assistance of your throats
Ye all can swallow, and she asks no more.

Miscellaneous.

The Agriculture of Palestine.

In no part of the civilized world where a productive soil abounds, is the condition of agriculture at a lower ebb than in the country about Jerusalem. The city is largely inhabited by Jews, many of whom are the pensioners of their brethren in all the rest of the world. They are miserably poor, indolent, and without employment. The country round about is in the hands of the Arabs, who hate the Christians much and the Jews more. The Arabs are the worst farmers in the world. Their implements of husbandry are so rude and primitive that a sample of them would even surprise a cotton planter of South Carolina.

It is supposed by many that the lands of Palestine are generally of the poorest character for the purposes of a husbandman. Nothing could be further from the truth. The country possesses a great diversity of climate, owing to the variation in elevation. The Valley of the Jordon, at the level of the Dead Sea, is 1,312 feet below the Mediterranean, while the Mountain of Lebanon rises above the line of perpetual snow, which is 9,300 feet above the level of the sea, so that here is perpetual winter, while the Valley of the Jordon is a perpetual tropical climate, and between these variations of altitude there are all the varieties of productions of the temperate zones. The soil is generally a calcareous, light-colored loam in the interior, particularly near Jerusalem, and near the sea shore it is of a dark red loam, and on the plains of Sharon very productive, yielding three crops a year of such things as will ripen within that space. The soil produces good wheat, corn, oats, and potatoes, &c., about equal to the average crops of Connecticut. Cotton has been produced here in quality and product per acre equal to the best upland plantations in this country.

Fruit of various kinds grow to great perfection. The grapes in particular are very superior, while peaches, pomegranates, apricots, plumbs, olives, figs, oranges, and melons are rich and abundant.

Altogether, the climate and soil, and the productions, make it a most desirable country for a residence. The rich lands near Jaffa can be bought for a sum about equal to six or eight dollars the English acre.

To all this there is a drawback, which has heretofore deterred settlers from seeking a home there, who know how to appreciate and cultivate such a soil and make its productions profitable and homes in such a climate pleasant and beautiful. The country is in the possession of Arabs, who, in point of civilization, are but a small remove above the wild Indians of this continent.

From time to time missionary efforts have been made in Palestine, both by English and Americans, with one universal degree of success—that was, to make no converts, but embitter the bigots against those who were trying to tell them of a better religion than their own.

Two years ago, an effort was made in a new line, to ameliorate the condition of the inhabitants of Palestine. Seven Americans, with improved ploughs and other tools, and American seeds, located upon a piece of land seven miles from Jerusalem, one mile from Bethlehem, and made preparations for farming after the American system.

Their location was in the valley of Artos, upon the site of one of the very gardens of Solomon.

Their friends in the city were much opposed to their going out there to reside, urging them, if they were determined to try to cultivate the soil, to keep their residence in the city, for fear of the Arabs. This did not suit their plans, and they took up their residence upon the land, and commenced operations, ploughing deep with one of our best ploughs, harrowing with an iron-toothed harrow, such as was never seen here before, and planting corn, potatoes, beans, peas, oats, barley, wheat, and all sorts of garden vegetables; in short, making a perfect American farm.

These operations, instead of exciting the jealousy of the Arabs, aroused them to a state of surprise, and the news of what the Americans at Solomon's garden were doing, and what wonderful tools they were using, and how peaceable and quiet they were, never saying anything about their religion, flew on the wings of the wind, and visitors came to view and wonder, from far and near. The operations of the carpenter and blacksmith were not among the least sources of wonder. The rapid manner in which he heated his iron, and hammered it into just such shape as he desired, was beyond the comprehension of these simple-minded people.

One day the farm received a visit from twenty-five Sheiks, who inspected the tools and the way they were used, and the effect produced, and looked at the growing crops, so much beyond anything they had ever seen produced before, and then turned their heads together, to consult upon the wonders they had witnessed. The conclusion was that these people must possess a very superior kind of religion, as that is the standard upon which they base all their estimates of character. They made application at once for several of their sons to serve apprentices to American farming, and did not even object that they should be taught the principles of the American religion; for surely, said they, it must be a good religion, as these are very good people, and God blesses their labour beyond any other in Palestine.

It would have been dangerous now for any one to molest the American farmers, since they had all the Sheiks and principal men in the country on their side, and anxious for their success and influence. The Jews, too, began to think it would be better for them to cultivate such a fruitful soil than starve in the city, as many of them have done, and they began to apply for situations as laborers notwithstanding the priests always taught them it was derogatory to the national character of the Hebrews to till the soil. Though, if they had undertaken it by themselves, they would not have been permitted by the Arabs, who hunt them like they would wild beasts. But, under the protection of the American farmers, the Arabs will permit them to labour, and it is now a matter of serious discussion among those who know of the success of this enterprise whether the most feasible plan for colonizing the Jews of Palestine, is not to make them cultivators of its rich soil.

Owing to some difficulty which arose in regard to the title of the land they commenced upon, in the Valley of Artos, the little colony moved last year to the plains of Sharon, where they have got a permanent location, and the number now consists of ten Americans, male and female, and two Germans.

This effort has been made through the liberality of a few Christians in this City, and by the same spirit that actuated the first movers in this work, immense benefits may be conferred upon that country. All that is wanted to make it a desirable country for the emigrants of Europe is an increase of the present colony sufficient to form a nucleus or rallying-point, and more extended operations, and a gradual drawing in of the resident population to adopt the same modes of producing the varied and profitable products of the soil.—Tribune.

Cure for the Bite of Mad Dogs.

An exchange says "That an old Saxon has been using for fifty years, and with perfect success, a remedy for the bite of mad dogs, by the agency of which 'he has rescued many fellow-beings and cattle from the death of hydrophobia.' The remedy is to wash the wound with warm vinegar and tepid water, dry it, and then apply a few drops of muriatic acid, which will destroy the poison of the saliva or neutralize it, and the cure is effected."

How to Exclude Flies from Rooms.

Flies are beginning to be troublesome. According to Spence, the entomologist, they may effectually be excluded from a room in which the windows are left wide open for a free circulation of air, by suspending a net of light-colored thread to the outside of the window, and although every mesh is large enough, not only for one fly, but several flies with expanded wings to pass through at the same moment, yet, for some inexplicable dread of venturing across the mesh net, these insects are effectually excluded. It is necessary to state that in order for this plan to succeed, it is necessary that the light enter the room on one side only, for if there be an opposite or side window the flies pass through the net without scrupple.—Albany Atlas.

Burns.

In cases of burns, the common soap, besides its great value as a local application, commands the additional advantage of always being at hand in case of emergency. The lather is to be gently laid over the burned surface by means of a shaving brush, or something similar, and repeated as soon as the first coat begins to dry, or the pain returns.

THE MYSTERIES OF COOKERY.—It is said that some of the great cooks of ancient Greece carried their art to such perfection, that they were able to serve up a whole pig, boiled on one side and roasted on the other, and stuffed besides, though without a visible mark of the knife upon it. The inventor of this feat was cruel enough to keep the process secret for a whole year. At length it was revealed that he had bled the animal to death by a very small wound under the shoulder, by which he had also extracted the entrails piecemeal; that he had forced the stuffing down the throat; and that, by means of barley-paste, he had prevented the roasting on one side, having boiled it afterwards. It is also said of these Greek cooks, that by their saltings, picklings, and fryings, they could actually make a turnip pass for any kind of fish or flesh they chose!

A HINT FOR HOUSEKEEPERS.—A few drops of carbonate of ammonia in a small quantity of warm rain water, will prove a safe and easy anti-acid, &c., and will change, if carefully applied, discolored spots upon carpets, and indeed all spots, whether produced by acids or alkalies. If one has the misfortune to have a carpet injured by whitewash, this will immediately restore it.—Ohio Cultivator.

Hydrophobia.

The following anonymous letter, not dated, appears in the New York Tribune of the 29th ult., giving a cure for hydrophobia:—"Two boys, brothers, 10 and 12 years of age, and a sheep belonging to the father of these boys, were bitten by a rabid dog during the same hour. From advice given to the father, he procured a quantity of the bark of upland (commonly called black) ash tree. Of this he made a strong decoction, of which the boys were made to drink freely every day from the time of the bite during several weeks. No symptoms of disease ever appeared in either of their cases. The sheep was left without remedy to test the certainty of the rabid state of the dog. In a few days (ten or twelve) she left the flock and exhibited all the usual signs of hydrophobia. Her mouth was forced open and a pint of the strong decoction given her on a certain morning, and in the afternoon of the same day she joined the flock and grazed with them, and exhibited no further symptoms of the disease. The writer of this article understood that the name of the father of the boys was Hubbard, and resided in the State of Kentucky, or not far from Louisville.

ONE cold night in February, a traveller entered the log house of a Georgia planter, in an unsettled part of the State. A glorious pine knot wood fire blazed upon the hearth, but the apartment was nevertheless exceedingly uncomfortable, from the fact that the doors and windows stood wide open, admitted the full current of cold air upon one side of those within, while the other was fairly roasting.

"Well, stranger," said the planter, "I don't know how it is; I keep these tarnation great fires a goin' all day long, as you see, but somehow or other, the rooms ain't the thing no how."

"Shall I teach you how to make them comfortable?" asked the traveller.

"Why, I reckon I wish you would."

The stranger rose and closed the door and windows.

"Well, I declare, that is more comfortable anyhow. I tell you what, old woman," he added, turning to his wife, "you must recollect that."

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1854, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Business Relations—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plan adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches auxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanic artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 12. A member of the council shall be member of only one of the committees thereof.

Art. 13. All officers holding funds, shall give security in double the amount likely to be in their hands. This security to be given to the three first officers of the council.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper governmen

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS,
JOHN D. PECK,
AMOS G. BEMAN,
JOHN JONES,
J. D. BONNER,
J. MCCUNE SMITH,
Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL."

2. The foundation fund shall be thirty thousand dollars.

3. Twenty thousand dollars shall be in stock of 2000 shares, at ten dollars per share.

4. Ten thousand dollars shall be in donations to be solicited from the friends of the cause.

5. The shares shall be payable, ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and ten per cent. every first day of July, October, January and April thereafter, until the whole is paid in.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

c. The handicrafts shall be such that their produces will be articles saleable for cash, or money's worth, at a market within easy access from the School.

The agent appointed by the Committee Frederick Douglass, Esq., shall be empowered to receive donations and take subscriptions for stock, giving a receipt for the latter, signed by himself and Rev. Amos G. Beman, the Secretary of the Committee. For his services, the Agent shall receive five per cent. on all stock instalments paid in by him, and ten per cent. on all donations above two hundred dollars paid in by or through him.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Aliened American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the TRIBUNE'S Mission

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

Toronto, March 25th, 1854.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

MEN AND BRETHREN:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted rights, composing in fact and acknowledged necessary part of the fabric of society in which we live. The power necessary to the preservation of this element must be in our favor if ever we expect the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and destination, as to conflict or clash claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to pure benevolence, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures and objects set forth in this Call as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. If not, then, there is no part of the wide-spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent eligibility to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention, when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

FORGERY.
The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

The following are our only Agents in Hamilton, C. W. T. BICKLE & SON; HAMILTON, KNEESHAW & CO., In Toronto, LYMAN, BROTHERS, & CO., are our general agents—we also sell to SIMPSON & CO.

Poetry.

The Homestead.

BY LADY SPENCER.

It is not as it used to be,
When you and I were young;
When round each elm and maple tree
The honeysuckles clung;
But still I love the cottage where
I passed my early years,
Though not a single face is there
That memory endears.

It is not as it used to be!
The moss is on the roof,
And from their nests beneath the eaves
The swallows keep aloof.
The robins—how they used to sing
When you and I were young.
And how did flit the wild bee's wing
The opening flowers among.

It is not as it used to be!
The voices loved of yore,
And the forms that we were wont to see,
We see and hear no more.
No more! Alas! we look in vain
For those to whom we clung,
And loved as we can love but once,
When you and I were young.

Literature.

Homeless and Friendless.

It is a sad thing to think these words are true, touchingly and heart-rendingly true, as applied to any of our fellow-creatures now wandering the streets of this great city. On a sunny morning of last week, which succeeded one of those cold, drizzling nights of rain that made us shiver to look out upon, we were coming down one of the streets not a great way from the centre of wealth and luxury, the St. Nicholas Hotel, when our step was arrested by the sight of a female figure leaning against a lamp-post at the corner of a cross-street. We might have passed a hundred such figures without seeing or noticing them; but there was something in the appearance of this one that attracted our attention at the very first glance. Though we had not then seen her face, there was something in the appearance of her dress that told the sad tale of the two words at the head of this item. She was tall and well formed. Upon her shoulders hung, in graceful folds, the sad remains of a fine cloth cloak. Her dress was once a rich muslin de laine. It was faded now, and six inches of the skirt told that its wearer had wandered the muddy streets the long, long rainy night. We turned the corner and walked on, wondering somewhat why she stood thus upon the street waiting for the world to go by. We were not satisfied and looked back to see what sort of a face was owned by the wearer of that bedraggled dress—One look did not suffice. There was a melancholy sadness spread over her countenance like a mask, but it was not thick enough to hide the look of by-gone days. We knew her. To be fully satisfied, however, we crossed over and stood by the side of one of the huge piles of bricks that encumber our streets in all directions, the debris of demolished tenements. Upon the opposite side of the street stood the debris of another pulled-down tenement—a tenement not made with hands—one which human skill can never build—one which human ingenuity may adorn and make beautiful, and fit for a home in Heaven—one which human—inhuman—beings have pulled down and left a mere wreck of what it was created to be—a form in God's own image, a worthy worshipper of its Creator. A score of masons were busy at work putting back the old bricks, adding new mortar, putting in new beams and braces, rearing up, refitting and replenishing the old tenement. It was time it was done, for it had stood there the allotted three-score years and ten of human life. Time had made its mark upon it, and it was pulled down and rebuilt. That was not the case with the other tenement, for it had not stood one third of that time, and yet it had been pulled down! Who did it?

There is yet life enough in the ruin to speak, let that answer.

While we stood contemplating the spectacle before us, the masons upon the building over our heads were sending down gibes and jeers, heart-wounding words, and calling opprobrious names to one whom, a short year ago, they would have spoken to with respect, or courted for favour; for then she wore the adornments of dress and the smiles of beauty. Those cruel words—thoughtless words not vicious ones, perhaps, fell heavily upon one heart; not hers—that was beyond the reach of hard words—she had rather hear them than kindly ones for her heart was seared.

Our hand went involuntarily into our pocket and clutched a coin; it was only a small one. We shall never miss that quarter, we never shall forget the look that met us when we gave it, or words that came in answer to our question,—

"Mary, why don't you go home?"

"Home! I have none, nor friends either."

Homeless and friendless! A young girl in the streets all night without a place to go that she could call home.

"Have you no home? Where do you live, then?"

"In the street. I wish I did not live anywhere. I'll go to Dutch Bill's grocery, and soon forget I do live. He turned me out of doors last night; I had no money then. He will let me in now I have got a quarter."

Had we done a deed of charity or a deed of wrong? The heart said it was well-intended, but truth told us it would be applied to support—the license system of the rum trade.

We said a few words, and Mary went and sat down upon a door-step and held her old cloak up to her face to hide a tear.

To our inquiry, "What has become of your friend William?" she replied.

"Friend! Devil! He robbed his employer to buy wine and treat me, as he did when you first knew me, a poor, hard-working, but happy sewing-girl, when I used to go out almost every night with him to late suppers, until, until ——— don't ask me what. See what I am. You heard what these brick-layers called me. "Where is Will?" "I saw him last night dressed like a gentleman with another, just such a poor simpleton as I was a year ago, going into a gilded sepulchre. How long before she will be a mother, a miserable outcast, poor drunken ——— you heard what they called me. Who made me so? I could send Will to the Penitentiary with a breath. What would be the use? He would come out a hero—they would fire guns in the Park—perhaps; I should not hear them. I should then be dead—if not, drunk. It matters not which. Who cares for me, or what I am now? Look at me. Do you see the Mary that made shirts for you. Look, I see my work now. You have it on. It is not yet worn out as I am. The stitch has lasted longer than the stitcher. The thread of cotton lives. The thread of life destroyed.—Oh, rum! rum! rum!"

She got up, and walked rapidly away towards a place "licensed to accommodate travellers," where she might drown herself in forgetfulness, with the very cause of her ruin.

'Tis a sad tale, but a true one: it has a sequel; the readers of The Tribune have read that. Our story was written when the reporter brought in the item, published a few mornings since, of a girl found dead in a cellar of a new building in Rende-st. We had a suspicion, a painful feeling that it might be—we went to see—it was Mary.—Two years ago she was blithe and beautiful, industrious, poor, virtuous and happy. She was tempted, flattered, mortified at not being able to dress as richly as others she met in the street or saloon in her evening walk with Will, accepted presents (stolen dry goods,) ate late suppers, drank wine, and became what we found her in the street; then drank cheap rum, poisoned alcohol, and died Homeless and Friendless in a cellar. Poor Mary! She is dead. Rum is not. We shall say on Tuesday we have done our duty towards killing it. If not successful we shall try again, and again. Who will do with us one little deed to avenge Mary?—New York Tribune.

Newspaper-dom.

It is beyond my comprehension how Methuselah lived nine hundred and sixty-nine years without a newspaper; or, what the mischief Noah did during that "forty days" shower, when he had exhausted the study of Natural History. It makes me yawn to think of it. Or what later generations did, the famished half-hour before meals; or, when travelling, when the old stage-coach crept up a steep hill, some dusty, hot summer noon. Shade of Franklin! how they must have been ennuyed!

How did they ever know when flour had "riz"—or what was the market price of pork, small tooth combs, cotton, wool and molasses? How did they know whether Queen Victoria had "made her brother an uncle or an aunt?" What christianized gouty old men and snappish old ladies?—What kept the old maids from making mince meat of pretty young girls? What did lovesick damsels do for "sweet bits of poetry" and "touching continued stories? Where did their papas find a solace when the coffee was muddy, the toast smoked, and the beef steak raw or done to leather? What did cab-drivers do, while waiting for a tardy patron? What did draymen do, when there was "a great calm" at the drygoods store of Go Ahead & Co? What screen did husbands dodge behind when their wives asked them for money?

Some people define happiness to be one thing, and some another. I define it to be a room "carpeted and furnished" with "exchanges," with a place cleared in the middle for two arm-chair —one for a clever editor, and one for yourself. I say it is to take up those papers, one by one, and laugh over the funny things and skip the stupid ones, to admire the ingenuity of would be literary lights who pilfer one half of their original (?) ideas, and steal the remainder. I say it is to shudder a thanksgiving that you are not in the marriage list, and to try, for the hundredth time, to solve the riddle: how can each paper that passes through your hands be the best and cheapest periodical in the known world?"

I say it is to look round an editorial sanctum, inwardly chuckling at the forlorn appearance it makes without feminine fingers to keep it tidy; to see the looking-glass veiled with cobwebs; the dust on the desk thick enough to write your name in; the wash-bowl and towel mulatto colour; the soap liquified to a jelly, (editors like soft soap!); the table covered with a heterogeneous mass of manuscripts, and paper folders, and wafers and stamps, and blotting-paper, and envelopes, and tailor's bills, and letters complimentary, belligerent and pacific.

I say it is to hear the editor complain, with a frown, of the heat and his headache; to conceal a smile, while you suggest the probability of relief if a window should be opened; to see him start at your superior profundity; to hear him say, with a groan, how much "proof" he has to read, before he can leave for home; to take off your gloves and help him to correct it;—to hear him say there is a book for review, which he has not time to look over; to take a folder and cut the leaves, and affix guide-boards for notice at all the fine passages; to see him kick over the chair, because he cannot get hold of the right word for an editorial; to feel (while you help him to it) very much like the mouse who gnawed the lion out of the net, and then to take up his paper some days after, and find a paragraph endorsed by him, "deploring the intellectual inferiority of women."

That's what I call happiness!—Fern Leaves

Children and their Influences.

Nearer to glory they stand than we, in this world and the next. It was a gentle and not unholy fancy that made the Portuguese artist, Siquiera in one of his sweet pictures, form of millions of infant faces the floor of heaven, dividing it thus from the vault beneath with its groups of the damned and lost. For how many women has this image been realized? How many have been saved from despair and sin by the voice and smile of those unconscious little ones?—The woman who is a mother dwells in the immediate presence of guardian angels.—She bears on for her children's sake, she will toil for them, die for them, and live for them which is sometimes harder still.—The neglected, miserable, maltreated wife, has still one bright spot in her home. In that darkness a watchlight burns; she has her children's love—she will strive for her children. The angry and outraged woman sees in their tiny features a pleading more eloquent than words; her wrath against her husband melts in the sunshine of their eyes. Idiots are they who, in family quarrels, seek to punish the mother by parting her from her offspring; for in that blasphemy against nature they do violence to God's own decrees, and lift away from his heart the consecrated instrument of His power. The fact that there are careless and unnatural mothers does not destroy the argument. So there are men who are murderers, children who are monsters. Nature makes exceptions to all her great unswerving rules; they will remain to the end of time, and among them none more general, more pure or unfailing, than the love of a mother for her child.

Mazzini—Kossuth—Sanders.

LONDON. No. 45, Weymouth-st.,
Portland-place,
Friday, June 2, 1854.

GENTLEMEN: In the Morning Advertiser of yesterday I observe a letter, which is introduced as being a recent one from Mazzini, addressed to an Abolition Society at Manchester. The letter is, however, without date, and as Mazzini is not now in London to answer for himself, we are at a loss to guess at the time it was written. It speaks against Slavery in general, but not a word occurs in it of American affairs in this way; and it concludes by the emphatic and weighty declaration, that "Free men only can achieve the work of freedom"; and that "throughout all Europe" * * * "desecrated by arbitrary tyrannical powers"—"by Czars, Emperors and Popes" * * * "are millions of White Slaves, suffering, struggling, expiring in Italy, in Poland, in Hungary," whose emancipation he earnestly entreats may not be forgotten in zeal for the black race. I regret, therefore, to see the letter so introduced, by the gentleman giving it publicity, as to lead the impression that it was intended by Mazzini to bear upon the exciting slave controversy now convulsing the United States.

In Mazzini's absence, the great importance of an explanation going out to America by the mail which will carry his letter, and the knowledge I have of the perfect understanding which exists between yourselves and Mazzini, induce me to ask, in justice to myself and the question, that you will correct me if, in recent statements of mine to friends at home, I have, through any misapprehension, misstated the views of the Republican leaders in regard to European interference with American internal affairs.

From my repeated interviews with you all, during my stay in London, and our close and earnest discussion of all the leading points of your policy, I have felt authorised to say that it is your deliberate judgment that such interference was in opposition to the principle of State Rights, a cardinal principle of the Democratic statesmen of Italy, Hungary, France, Poland and Germany. A paper declaring this was, before being sent to America, expressely shown to Mazzini; and was then sent to the Louisville Democrat (Kentucky) and will be found in a March issue of that journal. It states, as the sentiment of the European Republican leaders in London, that they have faith in the honor and generosity and justice of the Southern States, that they will do of themselves what is right, in regard to the slaves, and the better for being left calm and free of irriation from any external influences.

The Republican statesmen of Europe, deeply interested in the history of the struggles and glorious success of the great Republic of America, must know that the existence of Slavery in the United States is an inheritance from the British Government, and that it involves, at the present day, questions of much greater magnitude than the simple cash value of the slaves; and that social and political equality cannot be created by foreign intervention. But the whole history of the United States as a Government, and as a people, shows that they have practically done more than any other nation for the advancement of the African race.

And that, in taking the lead of every Government in the world, in the Abolition of the Slave Trade, which was continued many years after by the British Government.

In the condition of the negroes in the Southern States, who are not, as in Italy, Hungary, France and Poland, a refined and civilized people, abased and crushed by the tyranny of their rulers, but a benighted race advancing, under the care of their American masters, from the barbarism which led them to sell each other into Slavery for a few trinkets, to a highly respectable grade of civilization and Christianity: the visible proof of which is shown in the prosperity and good government of the American Negro Republic of Liberia, whose respectable President is a manumitted American slave, from the Southern State of Virginia.

In the establishment of this America-African colony by the purchase of several hundred miles of slave coast, and the appropriation, by State legislation and individual donation, of hundreds of thousands of dollars for the comfortable passage and prosperous establishment of the American blacks; the most generous, the most disinterested act of benevolence ever shown by one people great and powerful to another inferior and weak, through which gleams, for all known ages, the first light which has beamed upon Ethiopia, a benevolence in which the Southern State governments and Southern masters have been the leaders and munificent patrons.

In that the United States is the only country on earth where white men and women are really free, and where even the soldier and sailor in service is not under the degradation of the lash.

Lastly—In the heroic republican act of the chivalrous Ingraham, a citizen of a Southern State, who struck a blow for free citizenship, which resounded under every throne in Europe.

In all these instances, they must recognise a national character, to which can safely be entrusted all questions of its own internal policy, with the certainty of a solution honorable to America, to Christianity, and to mankind.

They know that strife and ill-blood between the Northern and Southern people of the United States are music and luxury to the enemies of Democracy, now enthroned on the necks of the people of the European Continent; and must feel that, at this moment, critical of the fate of millions on millions of the finest races on earth, struggling for the sway of mind over force, of free thought over brute obedience, it is most urgently important that their only unshackled friends on earth—the people of the United States—should harmonize all differences, so that they may present to Europe an unbroken front, and give vigor to the movement, having for its aim—That the virtue and intellect of Europe shall guide its destinies!

Satisfied as I am that the Republicans of Europe—because of their appreciation of the Constitution of the United States, and of their joy in the onward and expansive career of our country and people—offer the only element of power which would be faithful to America, in the event of the United States becoming involved in a war with any European monarchy, and I am anxious that no misrepresentations, designed or accidental, should place their chosen representatives in a false position before any portion of the American people.

With these views, I respectfully ask you to say whether or not I am justified in assuring friends in the United States that the Republican representatives of Europe do in no way desire to interfere with any domestic question in the United States, and especially with one wherein, besides the subject of Slavery, so many other considerations of a political character are involved.

Your faithful friend,
GEORGE N. SANDERS.

To Louis Kossuth and others, Representatives of Jeffersonian Republicanism in Europe.

No. 21, ALPHA ROAD, REGENT'S PARK,
London, June 3, 1854.

DEAR SIR: Upon carefully reading your letter, I reply that, while deploring the existence of Slavery anywhere, all my influences are against foreign interference with the affairs of another nation. Besides, though be it from natural necessity, be it from the impassivity of its leading statesmen, the United States do not appear conscious of their competent position; still I consider the strength and prosperity of the only republican power on earth so important to the future destinies of the world that I certainly would never contribute anything to its internal divisions. Nay, true to my principles, I cannot recognise any division in America; I look to the brotherhood of the great Republic as a whole, and have too high a respect for the American people, as one undivided body of sincere republicans, not to believe they will of themselves, with all the light before them, make their nation a model for every other.

You are quite right in your belief that Mazzini's letter has no reference to the present agitation in the United States; this is made certain by the fact of its being an old letter.

With high regard and sincere esteem, yours respectfully,
L. KOSSUTH.

George N. Sanders.

The Poor Man's Church.

A memorial has just been forwarded to Lord Palmerston, setting forth the facts of a case which affords a striking commentary on some of the statements ventured upon by the supporters of Church-rates in the late debate. The memorialists are the Dissenting ministers and other inhabitants of Ringwood, Hants, and the following is the material portion of their allegation:—

"On Monday, the 24th April, Isaac Early and Henry Larkham—married men, one having a family of two, the other of three children—labourers, earning less than nine shillings and sixpence each a week, and parishioners of Ringwood, having [illegible] poverty and utter inability to pay [illegible] Church-rates assessed upon them, amounting to 1s. 9d. and 1s. 10½d. respectively, were apprehended on a warrant—were handcuffed together, though offering no resistance—were retained in hold until the next day, and were then conveyed to Winchester Gaol, where, on their arrival, they were stripped, washed, their own clothes exchanged for the prison garb, and were, in all respects, treated as common felons. They were allowed no communion with their friends, even by letter; were kept in continual confinement (with the exception of about an hour daily for exercise,) within a cell measuring about nine feet by five; and were compelled, when thus permitted statedly to revisit the open air, to wear a sort of mask, to prevent them seeing around them; and all these indignities heaped upon them, their only crime being poverty, and consequent inability to meet the demands of the 'National Church!' Public feeling was soon aroused, and a subscription set on foot; and by this measure these poor men were released—one of them after an incarceration of eight days, the other of three weeks."

We understand that the two victims have petitioned the House of Commons on the subject, and the attention of the House is likely to be called to it.—British Banner.

Negro Emancipation.

On Monday evening last, a lecture on Negro Emancipation was delivered in the Old Meeting House, St. Clement's, by the Rev. S. R. Ward, of Canada—a 'coloured gentleman, who had escaped from slavery, and become a minister of the gospel to the fugitive slaves that had found freedom in our American colonies. His fame as an eloquent pleader of nogro emancipation and colonial missions in general, attracted a crowded audience. Having been briefly introduced by the Rev. A. Reed.

The Rev. S. R. Ward commenced his address by a very eloquent description of the attractions Canada held out to emigrants, and he stated that its population was increasing at an enormous ratio, and that thousands of Englishmen, Irishmen, and Scotchmen were continually pouring into the country. He then pointed out the necessity that the foundations of the colony should be placed on a firm and a sound basis, and that it was a question of the deepest importance for the country to determine, whether, by its assistance to Canada, that colony should be founded in righteousness, or whether, through neglect, it should be suffered to grow up in ignorance, and thus become a reproach to us. He then entered upon a consideration of the important trust which had been committed to our hands in the numerous colonies which belonging to us. We had colonies, he said, in every part of the globe, and they were not unimportant colonies either as regarded their extent of territory, their enormous agricultural and commercial resources, the great moral influence which they were destined to wield, their contiguity to the heathen countries of the world, or the facilities by which through their means these countries could be reached. On the last of these considerations he more particularly dwelt. He had no doubt that Britain would exert every influence in her power to develop the commercial resources of her colonies, but—when we knew that the children of this world were in their generation wiser than the children of light—a doubt might be fairly entertained whether so much care would be used to develop their moral resources. God, however, seemed to be raising up the British people for some great purpose. They were, for instance, the rulers of the great Australian colony, which was so situate that it could not exist without exerting great influence on the benighted people in that portion of the globe. If to those who went thither to dig gold, we gave knowledge and an appreciation of the hidden treasures and the power of Christianity,—if, as fast as population concentrated there from all portions of the globe, we took care they were made acquainted with the laws of Christ through his gospel, —if, as fast as the population teemed on the island, the gospel was taken to their doors—the effect for good, first upon the island itself and then upon the surrounding islands, South-Eastern Africa, and Southern Asia, could not but be great indeed. If we only saw how great were our responsibilities, growing out of our advantages, for the evangelization of the world through the medium of our colonies, we should be more earnest in the important work which we had to do. He submitted that it was a cause for thankfulness that God had given to Great Britain such colonies, through which we could reach the heathen world. The rev. gentleman then referred more particularly to the Canadian missions, and the great importance of encouraging and assisting them, as a means of counteracting the ill effects of, and ultimately of removing the evil of, slavery. He had no hesitation in saying that the British American colonies adjoined the very worst country on the face of the earth; and he would give them his reasons for making that statement. It was a country making the greatest pretensions to religion and progress,—the United States, he meant—and yet it was a country that held one-sixth of the population in just such a manner as sheep and oxen were held in England. There was not a Catholic country on the earth in which such laws existed prohibiting the education of slaves, as in some parts of the United States. Indeed, those very territories which were obtained from Spain in 1805, and formed into States, had laws such as disgraced no Catholic country, as he would prove by-and-bye. The sole reason of the war with Mexico was the same as that of Cain's murder of his brother—"because his own deeds were evil and his brother's righteous." Mexico had freed her slaves, and for that reason, and that alone, war was declared against her. When Spain was at war with her colonies, and the Mexicans were about to make an attempt to deliver Cuba and Porto Rico from the Spanish yoke, the American Government declared that if they proceeded to carry out such intention, they would oppose them by force of arms; the reason alleged being that the freeing of the slaves in those islands would produce disaffection amongst the slave population of the United States. The rev. gentleman then proceeded to mention the various efforts made by the United States, in their negotiations with this Government, to obtain permission to capture runaway slaves in Canada. In 1827 a communication was sent to Downing-street to that effect, but no notice whatever was taken of it; and again in 1842, when the Ashburton treaty was concluded, endeavors were made to smuggle into it a clause to the same effect, but without success. The United States, he said, was a Christian country, and yet it prohibited the circulation of the Bible amongst slaves, under severe penalties. An agent of the Bible Society, when in Louisiana, was upon one occasion about to bestow a copy of the Scriptures upon a poor slave, when he was arrested and brought to trial for the offence, and was only acquitted because the jury believed his strenuous assertion, that he was ignorant of the existence of such a law, to be true—the judge cautioning him never again to interfere with institutions which "were as dear to the people of the State as religion itself!" In that same State, if a person taught a slave to spell the name of Jesus Christ, the punishment for the first offence was a fine of £100, and for the second the penalty of death. The lecturer then went on to state that his parents were born slaves; that his father had been stabbed in his arm with a penknife up to the handle for making a trifling mistake, and had had his back so lacerated with the whip that his mother had been obliged to wash it with brine in order to prevent mortification. He was himself born a slave, and that circumstance, perhaps, had given some tinge to his statements; his audience might, therefore, believe or disbelieve them as they thought proper. Now, it was not a barbarous country in which these scenes took place; but it was a nation which professed to be guided by the Bible, and at the same time peremptorily refused it to 500,000 families. The speaker then described the condition of the blacks in Canada. He said he was happy to say that the preaching of the gospel was attended with great success amongst them, and that they were as loyal as any of her Majesty's subjects. The same might be said of the West Indies, and he could give the testimony of missionaries that in no other portion of the British empire had the Christian religion so controlling an influence as amongst the negroes. Now he would tell them of the ruin of the island of Jamaica. Twenty years ago the slaves were freed by the British Government, but had previously to serve an apprenticeship of seven years. They had, however, the option of becoming free at once by paying their masters the value of their labor for that period; and many of them did so by paying at the rate of 3s. per day. When, however, the term of the apprenticeship expired they were told that their labor was only worth about 1s. 6d. a day. They went to work at these low wages and by great economy saved enough to enable them to purchase land; and there were now 100,000 of them who owned on the average about three acres each. The consequence was they soon found out that by working for themselves they could earn £50 per acre, while their former masters only offered them from £13 to £18. They therefore preferred to be their own masters, while the old proprietors talked of the laziness of the negroes and said the country was being ruined. These facts he had lately discovered in the course of some business transactions he had had in Jamaica. The speaker then proceeded to describe in glowing colors the enthusiastic loyalty which characterised the free negroes in Canada. He said he had seen in the papers that John Mitchell, the recreant Irishman, proposed to go and invade Canada. A Tory paper, however, had quietly remarked that they had fugitive slaves enough in Canada to attend to him, and that they would, as the saying was, "blow him into the middle of next week" if he was foolish enough to make his appearance there. The negroes would not endure a word to be said against the Queen without at once showing their pugnacious propensities; and if John Mitchell were to go there it would be the finishing up of all his follies in this world. They were a loyal and progressive people—a people who had won the good regards of their fellow citizens, and it was determined to hold them up to the view of the United States and say, "See here the men you have crushed." And it was hoped in that way to abolish slavery. The rev. gentleman then urged the claims of the Colonial Missionary Society to the sympathy and support of the Christian world, and concluded with an eloquent appeal for pecuniary assistance.

The Rev. A. Reed thanked the lecturer on the part of the meeting for his able address, and stated that Mr. Ward would deliver an address upon Canada on some future occasion in St. Andrew's Hall.

The Doxology was then sung, and the proceedings terminated. A collection was made at the doors, amounting to about £10.

Old Men with New Views.

It is a glorious thing for us that we do not believe all that we read in black papers as well as others, else we would be stupid enough to find ourselves thinking, talking and acting towards our people just as do our bitterest enemies. We never did believe that it was necessary for the negro to prove any thing by specific effort on his part to convince his oppressors that he could live among white men as a man. The fact that the opportunity to prove it was denied him in some countries, was and is conclusive to our mind that his oppressors had no doubt about the fact. No, they are right, common sense and experience, every day experience of the colored man in Europe, Asia, Africa, the West Indies and Canada—yes in every country of the world but Yankeedom proved that, and yet in the Frederick Douglass' paper for June 30th, we find in an article on the "colored people in Canada," the following, in connexion with much that is reasonable, absurd, amusing, petty and contradictory:—

COLORED PEOPLE IN CANADA.—"In a very important sense, the colored people of Canada have a fair field. They are equal before the law with any and every other class of citizens, and were preceded in their immigration by very little prejudice on the score of complexion. The future of this people will measurably solve the problem whether the colored man can rise to independence and respectability among the whites, when he has anything like fair play for the exercise of his faculties and powers. If he can, Canada will be the place where the fact must be developed and established. Its government and its people are alike friendly. The soil is good, the climate is favorable to all sorts of exertion, mental and physical—character, not color, is the condition or criterion of respectability. A colored man can be a magistrate, or a legislator, for aught that the law or popular prejudice opposes thereto. The "world is all before them where to choose"—a blank page is presented them upon which to write their own destiny, and whatever their future may be, whether of honor or dishonor, whether good or bad, they themselves must be largely, if not entirely responsible; and the reflex influence of their position must, whether good or bad, be shared by the colored people on this side of the lakes. We are one people, and linked together by ties stronger than hooks of steel. There is no merely Canada interest to uphold to the prejudice of the colored people in the States, and vice versa. Hence no encouragement should be given to the spirit which would put discord between those colored people who have taken up their homes in Canada, and those who still think it best to remain in 'The States.' A difference of opinion is not made the ground of personal bitterness among sensible and rightbearted people, especially when the ties of a common interest are of transcendantly greater importance than the points at which we differ. Recognizing the tremendous responsibility attaching to every colored man, now representing his race in Canada, it will be our purpose to cheer on every righteous effort which is made there to improve and elevate the race."

1. That Canada is a "fair field"—that "the colored man can be a magistrate"—that the inference that prejudice does not "hurt" may be called reasonable;—these things are true: he has a fair field; we have colored magistrates.

2. That the colored people here are affected by the legislation, &c., of the States, bearing upon colored people, is absurd; that we are one people, is another absurdity.

3. That the writer intends to elevate people here by his policy, and so lead the world, is amusing.

4. The caution about "personal bitterness," pulling down, and advice about "discord," make up the petty.

5. That the future will solve the problem whether colored men can rise to independence and respectability, contradicts the plain position taken by all the anti-slavery men of the country for the last twenty years, the writer included. Slaveholders have all along said there was a problem to solve, and they fear black men cannot solve it; and last and least expected colored abolitionists with the self-evident fact staring them in the face in Canada, to talk in the same way.

What is there in the nature of the colored people?

Slaveholders say the negoes are not fit for freedom; and Frederick Douglass seconds the remark, by gratuitously circulating statements bearing the same interpretation. In spite of all that they can and do now in Canada, they are not only degraded beyond measure, but it is a question if they will ever be anything else. The same class of colored people in Canada will bear favourable comparison with the whites, we venture, and that is not saying anything in favour of slavery, nor denying that the people here have a work. What potent influence can make such changes, we would like to know? Is it the thought that others may have something to do and may get the reward they desire to have? or is it that the cry of more work brings more pay? Whatever it is, the path is a dangerous one to men of lofty position in the present propressive state of our people in Canada.

We see also that at the General Association of Congregationalists, lately held in Michigan, Rev. C. C. Foote appeared in behalf of the Refugee Home Society, an organization in Detroit, holding lands in Canada for Fugitive.

Rev. A. St. Clair asked why a Refugee Home is necessary in a foreign land, meaning this country, and proceeded to answer it by giving the three replies appended:—

"1st. Because they cannot be properly instructed in our own.

"2d. The Colored man is allowed no resting place but in Slavery. If he flee and come among us, instead of aiding him, we are commanded to return him to Slavery.

"3rd. The sense of moral obligation on this subject is so low as to suffer this system and law!"

How is this elevation to be effected?—The greatest dependence must be upon the gospel and its ministers. He hoped this Association would give a repetition of its opposition to the Fugitive Slave Law like surges stronger and sterner, as since this body last met the compromises have been repealed, and the state of things in this direction are getting worse and worse. He thanked the clergy for their sympathy and co-operation in freely receiving him to their pulpits during the past year.

Now, we know, as does Mr. St. Clair that no considerable body of colored men nor whites in Canada think the Refugee's Home necessary at all; but very many—the majority—consider it detrimental to the interests of the very class it is said to benefit. Thirty-nine thousand seven hundred at least, of the forty thousand colored people of the Province, have nothing to do with it,—are not elevated or improved by it—but are steadily, though slowly, improving themselves, and with far better results to themselves, than they can be improved by it. It sounds admirally to those who are ambitious to get a name and fame for liberality to the "poor negro." This talk about the Refugee Home—it is all very fine for the men who beg for the fugitives—who live by the trade, or who will descend to this species of bolstering, that they may have the co-operation of others in their plans, or who determine to try to make an obnoxious scheme popular; but fugitives of character—the fugitives, and Canadians generally, will not touch it; neither have they confidence in the men who show, as do the "owners" and managers of the Refugee Home, their superior qualifications for an "overseership." Mr. St. Clair says their elevation is to be brought about by a dependence upon the gospel and its ministers. What gospel?—the American gospel? The rapid strides made by slavery in his land of "gospel light and privileges" shows clearly that another species of gospel must be used. The trouble is, they have had just too much of the sort of gospel that pro-slavery men and pretended anti-slavery men, supporters of anything so clearly against the interest of Canadians as the Refugee's Home or similar schemes can have to give them. No. Colored people in Canada want British missionaries amongst them—not men tainted and spoiled with Yankee prejudice and Yankee religion, though making loud-mouthed professions of love and interest, &c. It is enough for us to know that in both countries there are thousands of whites as debased as any class of colored persons in Canada, for whose elevation quite other and less humiliating projects are encouraged. If, as we are told, "the colored people have all before them where to choose," will they choose, think you, if somebody volunteer his services to relieve them of the great responsibility, and in such a manner as to shackle them in independent efforts thereafter? Such is the case with the Refugee's Home; and these "long-headed" supporters of it know it full well. If the fugitives are as brutified as these men make believe to make the plan meet with favor, they are not fit for freedom, as slave holders say of them. But we do not believe a word of it. Slavery has done them great wrong; but God is above slaveholders, and has enabled them to preserve more of their manhood than their masters intended, or than we believe the owners of the Home want—or, at least than they will give them credit for. The vulgar adage that "It is hard to teach old dogs new tricks," is not verified by this somerset of professed abolitionists to the views of slaveholders. They should rely more upon "ministers." We submit that the quality of the ministers is an item of importance. No people have been more under their influence—the quantity has been quite large enough. A little more reliance upon themselves would not do any harm, and less upon such as the Home Society will send. But what do these various changes of opinion in men who have held other views, and views which would bear a comparison with a disadvange to their new ones, but that they, too, must make their wares conform to the market? The people will pay—and well—if the commodities suit—and in no way will the negro question be better received than to represent him as poor, miserable, pittiable, and likely to be until the "problems are solved," and as needing somebody to do for him after their fashion—which is undoubtedly the best for themselves. *

What We will do, and what We will not do.

We have been accustomed, in our short career, to look over the exchanges with which we are favoured, as well as to discover the progress, if any, made by the different luminaries now in full blaze; and to exercise the privilege we thought we possessed in common with others of our sex,—no, that is not the word, with the "fraternity," to comment freely thereon, as well as to "read the news." We would like to do so still, and shall, we think, though we suppose we ought to be regulated by the thought that we "colored people" should all think alike: get along together without "contention": should go to but one mill or market, and all partake of the same commodities when there. We must bear in mind, too, that somebody owns the field, and that if we want the Freeman to succeed, (for that is our idol,) we must mind what we say of "our friends," for though true, it may sound "harsh." We should be careful, too, and not violate the law, as recently promulgated from the tripod by a high-priest,—whose energy we must admire, though our conscience will not assent to his measures; that is, look through his spectacles and see our people in Canada and the U. S., through his interests. Just here a question or two occurs: must we do this? and must we be influenced by threats given and "hints" cast, such as men would not give to a man, or shall we pursue such a course as our people of Canada and those of the States worth asking, approve, and our conscience will permit?—We think the latter plan should be, and it shall be ours, regardless of the consequences.

In an article in the Frederick Douglass' Paper, on the "Colored People in Canada," we find many strange and really injurious, though ingenious statements made respecting the coloured people of this country,—also, a disposition to take somebody to task—also, fears expressed, and advice given, with a wind-up of voluntary championship, such as might do at a May meeting in New York, but is as talk thrown away here.—Now as is our right, we must, for the sake of our readers, attend to these matters a little; and though we disclaim all "personal" differences, and have no idea of a discussion, we may say that if any one is perched on a rotten pedestal and fears to tumble down, or should our course, which is clearly to attend to "our business," and thereby promote the interests of all good people, in a greater or smaller degree, help any one to come down; we have no more objection than would others who might be meant,—for we are sure such people would have no business up.

The fact that somebody is displeased, is no evidence that we are wrong. We have felt it necessary to say this much, that our friends may see that we no more intend to be frightened from our post, until the senior returns, at least, than we do to encourage the "wise councils," (Provincial ones, we suppose,) said to be needed by would-be leaders of Canadians, living in the States.

OUTRAGE.—A free coloured man named James Wright was taken from a steamboat at New Orleans, some days ago, claimed as a slave who had left his master twelve years since, and returned to the claimant, who immediately afterwards sold him to a Cuban. Wright was a resident of Penn township, in this county, and has lived in this neighbourhood for the last nine years. His wife was employed on board the boat as a chamber-maid when her husband was seized.—Pittsburg Gazette.

Well, they will go there! They "still think it best to remain" in the States, and as they think so, think they have a right to go where they please—do go, and the above is more frequently the end of their journey, than most persons suppose. The almighty dollar is nearly driving men mad,—coloured men as well as others, in Yankeedom; they will go into the lion's den for it. They go before the public with long, speeches, long faces, long stories for it. They go to New Orleans, and run the risk of seizure without any means of release for it, and once nabbed, we suppose everybody should be sorry about it; at least they should say they are, whether they areor not, and so swell the "mournful sound," to please the money catchers. We can only force a cry for James Wright when we learn that he is insane: if sane, he had no business there, though he clearly had the natural right to go, if any one had.

On second thought, it may be that he is not to blame after all, for running headlong into slavery,—he is only carrying out the lesson read to every free coloured man in the United States, by pro-slavery whites, and coloured leaders,—he could doubtless see no difference between the position of coloured men in New Orleans and Canada, as they cannot see any, and so chose the former. *

AMERICA AND OTHER POEMS, BY JAMES M. WHITFIELD.—A neat little volume of poems by the above writer is before us, which, for the real merit of the different pieces, as well as the anti-slavery character of the work, we hope may have an extensive circulation. Mr. Whitfield, though comparatively unknown, is certainly entitled to a first place among the colored men, known as such in the United States, who have been inspired by the Muses. A copy should be in every family.

THE AMERICAN PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL for July (Fowler & Wells, Publishers) has been received. This excellent Monthly contains, among other matters of interest, a biographical sketch of the poet Bayard Taylor, which is worth more than the price of many subscriptions. The present number is the commencement of a new volume,—price $1 per annum. *

Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

MR. FREEMAN,—I observed in your last issue a circular over the signature "B.," as a kind of feeler I suppose for the coloured people to emigrate from this Province to the British West Indies. Upon which I was much pleased with your remarks. If any people had a cause to exclaim, "Save me from my friends," it is, the colored people of this continent that have. A treacherous friend is worse than an open enemy. Are the colored people to be machines for ever in the hands of a few fortune seekers, to be moved about as it may best suit their avarice. In the name of all that is just, are the colored people to have no resting place on this continent.

There are thousands who are taking refuge from American oppression in the British American Provinces on this continent, especially in Canada, the only country on this continent in which they can enjoy true freedom. And "B." comes forth with a proposition to decoy them to the West Indies. Is "B." identified with the colored people, if he is, he is a traitor, if he is not, I think he takes unwarrantable liberty with the privilege of the colored people to settle in Canada, and get themselves permanent homes. What advantages has "B." to offer to those whom he would decoy to the West Indies, above those they can have in Canada?—if he has any, let us have them, so that those who are interested may examine them; also, that an impartial public may see what they are. This West India scheme is twin to the African Colonization scheme, which was conceived in iniquity, and is being carried out in cruelty. What was the object of the latter, but to drain off the free colored from this continent, so as to prevent them from being any assistance to their wretched brethren in bondage, and so keep them in a contemptible minority for all time to come, that their oppressors might wield the iron rod of despotism over them more securely. Now, what would be the effect of "B.'s" scheme, if carried out to his wish, but to drain the colored people from Canada to the West Indies, thus preventing the colored people, who have taken refuge in Canada, from getting permanent homes, and being prosperous and useful members of society among their white fellow subjects; thus evincing to friend and foe that the colored and white races can live together on equal terms and prosper. Finally, Mr. Freeman, if you will permit, I intend this to be only the beginning of the most determined opposition to any and every scheme for an exodus of the colored people from Canada on any grounds or reasons, that can be given by "B." or those with whom he acts.

Yours, obediently,

A DESCENDANT OF THE AFRICAN RACE.

To the Provincial Freeman:

MR. FREEMAN:—I send you an imperfect sketch of our first meeting to organize a "Canadian Emigration Society." You will percieve that this, like all efforts that have for their object practical operation, meets with opposition; but I am pleased to say, however, whatever degree of opposition the opponents of action, (for such I must call them) can muster, will be of no avail. The masses are thoroughly awake on the subject, and convinced as to the necessity of removal somewhere, and where can they go where there are so many inducements held out to them as there is in Canada?

I am told that nine families went in one company from New York city last week, to be followed soon by a number of true friends. It is no longer necessary to urge and convince persons on the subject of "emigration"—I hazard the assertion, that seven-tenths of the people are favourable to it, although there are those that oppose it, and would not for the world have any "excitement to unsettle the people's minds." They would not, if they could help it, let the coloured people leave here—not even to go to heaven!—Besides these, there are those who are pretty comfortably situated with schools and churches, or as Missionaries, who are far bigger men amongst us here, than they would be in Canada. Here many of us you know, are objects of sympathy—in fact, most of us,—and it requires all of the intelligence that can be mustered, to speak for us; to defend our rights, and to discuss whether the laws, "institutions," and "constitutions" that crush us, are "pro-slavery" or "anti-slavery."

This delusion, however, that we must stay beneath the stars, and bear the stripes, either in New York or California (with no objection to Canada when annexed, and subject to the Fugitive Slave Law), for the benefit of the slave is fast losing ground.

You have judiciously alluded to the fact in your last issue, that our efforts heretofore, have been devoted to warding off difficulties, and not in untramelled efforts at direct progress. This is true,—and had half the efforts and expenses made by, and for coloured men in the different free States, to ward off these difficulties and plead for us been made in Canada, at a distance no further from the slave, who doubts but what it would have effected more good; or would the geographical lines, rivers, lakes and laws, so hem in the miseries of the slave on the one side, and our sympathies on the other. On the contrary, would not the reflex influence of men wholly free, and even though separated by geographical lines, but recognized as equals, and protected by law, than the crippled influence of men under laws made to crush and not to protect them.

A great revolution has taken place in public sentiment, among both the white and colored people, on various important subjects, affecting alike the general interest. Nothing has contributed more to produce that result than the universal disposition of our people to leave the States for Canada,—the place of their own choosing. It is a practical response to Mr. Greely, who says, that we must "do something, anything."

I hope to add some half dozen, to your numbers before long. S.

GENERAL NEWS.

Our dailies are discussing the probabilities of a general crash with men of business. Produce of every kind continues high, and labour not very plenty. Small dealers complain most seriously. A general crash here like that of thirty-seven, would effect no less serious, than those most worsted by the fall; our people, therefore, should look to it. I was somewhat particular to notice the effects on our people at the time of which I speak. I think I have an old M. S. on the subject which I may send you. However, I can only say here, that the man doing a business of five hundred thousand, fell to take the place of the hundred thousand dollar man; and the hundred thousand dollar man took the place of the ten thousand dollar man; and the ten thousand dollar man took the place of the one thousand dollar man; and the one thousand dollar men entered as competitors with colored men in every conceivable branch of trade and industry that could be mentioned, and in numerous instances the latter perhaps less qualified than his fallen rival, was ousted from his hitherto unmolested position. We have never gained the same position and access to the same pursuits since. I think we may with safety, calculate on a general smash, a general breaking up or breaking down of business men, of parties and politics, and in fact of every thing that can break—the Union not excepted. S.

Brooklyn, L. I., June 28th, 1854.

For the Provincial Freeman.

Pursuant to public notice, a meeting of colored citizens of Brooklyn, was held in Granada Hall, on the 30th instant, for the purpose of organizing a "Canadian Emigration Society." On motion, Francis Champion was appointed Chairman, and J. N. Still, Secretary. At which, Dr. T. J. White remonstrated in the most severe terms against the appointment of officers for the meeting, or attempting to organize any such "Society," saying that it was not called for, and that this was not a meeting of the citizens of Brooklyn, &c., &c. With difficulty the Doctor was prevailed on to come to order. After which, J. N. Still stated the object and design of the callers of the meeting; being to procure information in relation to Canada, the state, condition of the country, the price of lands, the most suitable routes of travel, &c., &c., and that this necessity grew out of the fact, that large numbers of our people from this vicinity, were contemplating on going to Canada; some emigrating to settle, and others going to see the country, and that he was daily applied to for information, necessary for them to know, but which he was not in possession of, and consequently not prepared to give. He, with others, had concluded, therefore, to put "ourselves" into an organized form, to communicate officially with persons of confidence for reliable information, and besides this, to recommend to such persons wanting such information, the papers devoted to the investigation and dissemination of such; there being two such, namely: the Provincial Freeman, by Samuel R. Ward, and the Voice of the Fugitive, by Henry Bibb.

Mr. Still said that it was not his present intention to discuss the question of emigration, but to insist upon the consistency and propriety of the course they were persuing in this matter, they did not wish to influence nor control public sentiments in this matter, or to invite any angry discussions, from that reason, they invited those only who were favorable to the movement; those intending to emigrate, and who desired to act intelligently and advisedly in the matter; he thought, however, the signs of the times admonished some decisive action on the part of the colored people, and was most urgently called for. The whites of the West, the owners and possessors of the soil, and invested with, and protected in the enjoyment of every right recognized by the constitution, were "emigrating" to the newly admitted Territory of "Kansas and Nebraska," in order to plant and build up free institutions from the grasp of slavery. Why should not the colored people do the same, in territory which may yet some day become a part of this confederacy.

After some considerable discussion by several gentlemen, it was concluded not to proceed with the organization this evening, owing to the absence of several of the friends of the movement, from the unfavorableness of the weather. Mr. W. F. Johnson, of Rochester, on solicitation, then addressed the meeting at great length on Canada, its facilities, and the superior advantages, privileges, and inducements it held out to our people. He quoted, at great length, the views and opinion of the Rev. William Watkins, (who "emigrated" from the States) in support of his opinions. The Rev. gentleman he said was "not only an able and learned divine, but a most practical and exemplary business man, and by no means wanting in patriotism, love of country, and love of his people." Mr. Johnson admonished the friends of the movement not to be dismayed at small beginnings, nor the apathy and disapproval of the inert and contented, who were afraid to shoulder the responsibility of their destiny. All great and good movements (said he) were characterized by a small number and opposition from the founding of the christian religion, down to the peopleing and building up this great and powerful republic, and the organization of the Anti-slavery Society, by Clarkson, Wilberforce, and Sharp.

Mr. Clark, late of Bermuda, also spoke at some length, detailing a circumstance of commencing and building up a college in that Island; the opposition of the whites, and the indifference at first of the colored people, themselves; but it has now become a flourishing and popular institution. Mr. Johnson was invited, and consented to lecture on the subject of "Canada," on the following Monday evening. On motion, the meeting adjourned.

The news brought by the Baltic is brief, but of importance.

The Russians have evacuated the Principalities and are concentrating their forces beyond the Pruth. The night before last the Russian Reply to the Austrian note reached here, it is to the effect, that as a mark of high consideration for Austria, Russia consents to evacuate the Turkish territories.—On the 15th of June, the garrison of Silistria made an attack on the Russians, at all points and drove them across the Danube, pursuing this advantage, the Turks cross-sieged the Island where the Russians had constructed siege works, and from which Silistria had been bombarded. The Russians fled to the Wallachian bank of the Danube, and were compelled to witness the destruction of their batteries. There was nothing revolutionary or strategic in the flight of the Russians.—The defeat which preceded the rout of the 15th, had been followed by extensive movements, with the object of reinforcing the besieged. The expulsion of the Russians is entirely the work of the Turks. A despatch from Vienna, dated the 25th ult., says that the Russians are in full retreat to Moldavia. The Russians in the Dobrudscha are also retreating. The Turkish army, 20,000 strong, is advancing to relieve Rassova. Omar Pacha is moving, with great speed, his entire force to the Danube. The following important despatch announced the immediate retreat of the Russians from the Sultan's dominions, was published on Monday evening.

PARIS, June 26th, 1854

The Monileur published intelligence from Bucharest, on the 23rd, by telegraph via. Belgrade, it says. The siege of Silistria was suspended on the 13th, and has now been raised by superior orders. The Russians have evacuated Georgia, and the whole Muscovite army is about to retire beyond the Pruth.

PARIS, 27th.

A despatch from Vienna, on the 27th, says: The Russians retired en masse from Silistria. Their retreat was effected from all parts of Wallachia, in the direction of Achia and Stutat. The entry of the Austrians into the Principalities is decided upon. The Russians are retiring from Wallachia in all haste. They take with them their oxen, horses, and everything moveable, on which they could lay their hands, leaving nothing behind but their wretched paper money.

BLACK SEA.

The Lidon and Flexible arrived at Balthwick on the 6th of June, from the mouth of the Danube, having vessels in tow, one with military clothing and the others with powder for the enemy,—three of them were under Dutch, two Greek and one Neapolitan colours.

From the Field.

SATURDAY, June 24th, 1854.

The most important feature in the news of the week, is the gratifying intelligence that the Russians, utterly baffled by the gallantry of the defenders of Silistria, have raised the siege of that valuable fortress, before which their soldiers have fallen by thousands, and their generals have been severely and in more than one case, mortally wounded. The defence of this place is one of the most brilliant feats which the Muse of History has had to record, and we are not sure that, when the whole circumstances are taken into account, the prestige and the enormous force on one side, the discouragement and the comparatively inadequate means on the other, the resistance offered by Silistria will not take a foremost place in the annals of successful valour.

The historian will not fail to do justice to the Turks, by recording that "alone they did it." Not a single leaf of their laurels can be claimed by their tardy allies, the whole of whose assistance amounts to this, that when the Russian Generals had determined on retreat, their resolution was further justified by the receipt of news that the Anglo-French soldiers had arrived at Varna, and that they might, in time, come up to the rescue. But, had the Russians so pleased, they might have attempted the storm of Silistria half a dozen times more without the chance of a report of an English or French musket mingling in the grim chorus of war. Verily, the "sick man" has rallied wonderfully and shown himself far more vigorous than his doctor.

It is hardly necessary to say that the moral effect of this tremendous repulse will be almost entirely lost upon Russia. The accounts furnished by Imperial command to the Russian people are the most pitiable specimens of fraud, sophistry, and lying that ever were manufactured. The description of the attack upon Silistria, of the discovery, by the gallant Russians, that they were confronting perpendicular walls of an enormous height, which it was impossible to scale, and of the reluctant retirement of the assailants, whose frightful loss is officially reduced to a mere handful of men, is a marvellous illustration of the character of the Government for which Lord Aberdeen still ventures to declare his regard. The continuous destruction of stores of all kinds in the Baltic, by the vessels under Sir Chas. Napier, may have more effect because the truth has not so far to travel in the face of every conceivable obstacle; but nothing save the spectacle of Sebastopol in ruins will at once serve the double purpose of convincing Russia that her resistance is hopeless, and of liberating the Euxine and the Danube from the fradulent tyranny of the Czar. And it is to this object that the combined energies of the French and English fleets, it is understood, are directed. Whether Sir C. Napier intends to make a dash upon a Baltic fortress is still uncertain, but he is doing good service by a rigid blockade, varied by an occasional blow of considerable severity.

The venerable Lord Lyndhurst delivered in the House of Lords on Monday night a speech worthy of his manly character and his high intellect. It was a case of the "Roused Lion." This accomplished nobleman, in the presence of a brilliant audience, including the sovereign of Portugal, entered into an examination of the policy at present attributed to the continental powers in regard to Russia. This policy, though Lord Lyndhurst courteously treated it as continental only, was well understood in the House to be that approved by the Premier of England, and consequently the impeachment was against Lord Aberdeen. The proposition that Russia would be held to have done enough to entitle her to peace, if she evacuated Turkey, and so restored the status quo ante bellum,—a proposition said to find favor in the eyes of a certain portion of the Cabinet,—was assailed by Lord Lyndhurst with logical power and eloquent invective. He described the whole career of Russia to have been one of fraud, aggression, and falsehood; denounced any policy which should leave us without material guarantee for the future; and declared that no peace ought to be made until the Russian fleet in the Black Sea, and the fortifications behind which the ships are skulking, shall be entirely destroyed. The applause of the audience showed that Lord Lyndhurst was expressing the feeling of that branch of our Legislature. Lord Aberdeen, however, had the hardihood to stand up and declare that he did not consider that the policy of Russia had been one of aggrandizement; that he desired to make peace as soon as he could do so with honor; that the war was not one of vengeance; and that we "did not entertain any hatred against Russia." The last declaration may, we think, be fairly left without comment; but the most singular fact of all is, that up to the time of our going to press, Lord Aberdeen still continued to be the recognised organ of the Crown and of the nation.

Arrival of the Asia.

NEW YORK, July 13.

The Asia arrived last night. Breadstuffs have declined—Wheat 2d. a 4d; flour 1s. to 1s. 6d. on the week. White wheat quoted 11s. a 11s. 6d.; good extra 12s. a 12s. 6d. Western Canal flour 36s. a 37s.

The Asia brings 145 passengers and Liverpool dates to July 1st. The aspect of the war has undergone an entire change, and it is difficult to foresee what new complications may arise.

Austria is ready to march her 200,000 men into the Principalities, thus interposing between the combatants preventing further hostilities.—Austria has not yet received the Czar's official reply, and cannot receive it before July 3rd, and will not act decisively until it is received. The action of Austria is in accordance with the convention between herself individually and the Porte.

The Anglo-French force is now at Varna preparing, it is supposed, for an expedition under Arnaud in person into the Crimea.

The whole Russian army of occupation is falling back in good order with all its stores.

The garrison of Ismael, Gallacha, &c., are already on the march to the Crimea, and all disposable force will immediately follow, as it is expected to be the next battlefield.

Nicholas is on his way to the Crimea from Kiel.

Sir. C. Napier had concentrated his whole force on the Baltic, 25 miles from Cronstradt, on the 27th June, in a manner that would indicate an attack.

Four British steamers had bombarded Vomorosoure.

Both armies in Asia are motionless at Hars.

Greece is quiet.

There was an interesting debate in Parliament on the Fishing Treaty and Canadian Elective Council.

Captain Pearson of the ship Rose Standish, died of his wound received at the battle of Shanghae, China.

LATEST.

VIENNA, June 30.

The Times' correspondent is assured that Baron Meyendorff received his letters on Friday morning. Diplomatic relations with Russia will be broken off.

Count Ceronvi is to enter Little Wallachia by way of Orsova with about 30,000 men on July 3rd.

On the 20th and 23rd the Turkish vanguard, 25,000 men, attacked the rear guard of the Russians and drove it beyond Trajan's wall.

BERLIN.

A despatch was stated to have been received from St. Petersburg containing the Russian answer to the Austrian requisition. Well informed persons believe it gives no reason to expect that negotiations would be further prolonged. In the treaty between Austria and Turkey, it is added, that Austria will not enter into any arrangement with Russia which shall not proceed on the assumption of the sovereign rights of the Sultan and the integrity of the empire.

The Treaty with Japan.

The Alta California has news from the Sandwich Islands to May 21st. The U. S. Sloop of War Saratoga, Capt. Walker, arrived at Honolulu on the 29th April, in 25 days from Japan, being the shortest passage ever made. Capt. H. A. Adams, U. S. N., bearer of the despatches from Com. Perry, came in the Saratoga to Honolulu, whence he sailed to California on the Wavelet, on the 16th May. He brings the treaty concluded with Japan by Com. Perry, on March 28th, at Kennegawa, near the city of Yedo. The Alta California says:—

"We learn from Capt. Adams that the Treaty is not to take effect till the end of one year from its date, but that in the meantime vessels will be allowed to enter at the two ports which are to be opened for the purpose of procuring wood, water, and such supplies as the country affords. It is certain, however, that the laws of Japan will be rigidly enforced against any trade before the time specified in the treaty."

The Japanese are a people who have a strict regard for the solemnity of laws and forms, and they will insist that the portion of the treaty in regard to time shall be obeyed to the letter.

We learn that there is one important stipulation in the Treaty, of which we had not been previously advised, and which is highly advantageous to our government. It is to the effect that should the Japanese Government hereafter make any treaty with, or grant any privileges to any other power, the United States shall enjoy the benefits of such a treaty or grant, by virtue of the present treaty, and without the necessity of any further negotiations.

A coal depot will be established at Simoda, for the convenience of steamers running from California to China, and the Japanese agree to supply whatever quantity of coal may be required.

Death of Kossuth's Sister.

Madam Mezlenyi, one of the sisters of the illustrious Hungarian Kossuth, died at New York on the 29th ult. Her disease was consumption, the seeds of which were laid on that night in the winter of 1851, when she, with the other members of Kossuth's family, including her aged mother, were dragged through the streets of Pesth, by the Austrian soldiery, because the government of a tyrant was so weak that the presence of a few women was enough to make it fear for its own existence. There were two other sisters of Kossuth buried at the same time, Madame Ruttkai, and Madame Zulavsky. From a want of knowledge of the language, and a knowledge of business, these ladies have had to struggle very hard, being determined to support themselves without appealing to the sympathies of friends. The Evening Post says, Madame Mezlenyi "was induced by her necessities and her love of independence to disregard the warnings of her physicians, and, in spite of the cough which she had brought with her to this country, she would sit up with her work late at night, and between fatigue and anxiety of mind she rapidly brought her disease to a crisis. She had no wish to live, and was fully prepared to die. Death probably never approached a bedside armed with fewer terrors. She leaves two children, both daughters, one about eleven and one about thirteen years of age, to the care of her sister Ruttkai. This lady's husband is living in Austria, but he has been forbidden to come to her, or even to send her any means of support. She was obliged by her own exertions in the business to which she betook herself, to support her own family, consisting of herself and three children, and for the last year the family of her now deceased sister, whose sickness unfitted her for any kind of toil.

Such is tyranny, which a few poor defenceless and unarmed women can affright and shake with fear, though four thousand miles distant. The Austrian despot would starve them to death even here, if it were in his power.

Attempt to Fire a Store in New York, by its Occupant.

We learn that a party of policemen on Thursday night, hearing a noise in a storage warehouse, No. 147 Front street, occupied by Mr. Charles A. Peverelly, and finding the shutters unfastened, entered the building to capture the supposed burglars. Going up stairs, they found Mr. Peverelly himself and his brother Theodore, a lad of fifteen years, whom they took into custody. On examining the building, they found preparations which make it pretty clear that the intention of the occupants was to fire the building.

These preparations were mostly found in the cellar, and on the several floors of the rear building. The windows of the upper rooms were stuffed with cotton, apparently for the purpose of preventing the escape of smoke, until the fire had attained such headway that it could not be discovered in time to be extinguished. Handfuls of cotton, saturated with turpentine, were scattered about the floors. In the middle of one room a heap of cotton, hempen tow, and strips of pine board, was found wet with the same inflammable liquid, and having pieces of candle stuck upon it ready to be ignited. A piece of lighted candle was found stuck in a pile of combustible stuff in the cellar, and it was obvious that if it had not been discovered within five or ten minutes, and promptly extinguished, the whole building would soon have been in flames.—N. Y. Com. Advertiser.

GREATEST PASSAGE ON RECORD.—The late trip of the Baltic is pronounced by the New York papers the greatest passage across the ocean on record. She left Liverpool at 1 P. M., on Wednesday, 28th June.—Passed ship Calhoun inside the Bell Buoy. Came out the North Channel. Passed Cape Race at 8 P. M., July 4th at 9½ P. M.—On the 7th passed Light Ship on Nantucket South Shoal. Passed Sandy Hook at 11; 43 P. M., and arrived at the Battery at 1; 5 A. M., on the 8th, having made the run in 9 days, 16 hours, 53 minutes, mean time, by steam alone—not having used square sails at all, and only a few hours fore-and-aft canvas.

The College of Physicians on Cholera

"Royal College of Physicians, Oct. 15.

"The Cholera Committee of the Royal College of Physicians have received from various quarters applications for some plain directions calculated to be of service to the public during the prevalence of epidemic cholera, when medical advice may not be immediately at hand, and before such advice can possibly be obtained.

"For this reason the committee deem it right to offer to the public some instructions, which, on account of an extended 'notification' having been issued by the General Board of Health on the 20th of September, 1853, may be brief, and are in no case intended either to supersede the necessity of having recourse as speedily as possible to further medical assistance, or to impose any authoritative restriction on medical practitioners.

"DURING THE PREVALENCE OF CHOLERA."

"1. No degree of looseness of the bowels should be neglected for a single hour. Medical advice should be at once sought when the looseness begins; and, previous to the arrival of a medical attendant, some of the medicines at other times used for checking diarrhœa should be taken—for example, the chalk mixture; the compound cinnamon powder; or the compound chalk powder with opium, in doses of from 20 to 40 grains for an adult.

"2. No saline aperients or drastic purgatives should be taken without the advice of a medical man.

"3. Intemperance in eating or drinking is highly dangerous; but the moderate use of vegetable as well as animal food may be recommended; and, in general, such a plan of diet as each individual has found by experience to be most conducive to his health; for any considerable change in the diet to which a person has been accustomed is seldom advisable during the prevalence of an epidemic.

"4. Debility, exhaustion, exposure to damp, render the poor especially subject to the violence of the disease. The committeee urge upon the rich the necessity of supplying those in need with food, fuel, and clothing.

"5. The extreme importance of removing or counteracting all impurities, whether in the air, water, or soil, as by ventilation, cleanliness, and the free use of the chloride of lime or chloride of zinc cannot be too strongly insisted upon.

"Lastly, since the reports made to the College of Physicians show that of the persons who were engaged about the sick in the last epidemic the number of those who were attacked by the disease was, in proportion exceedingly small, the fear of infection may be practically disregarded.

"The committee forbear to dwell upon the extreme importance of providing medical attendants at dispensaries for the treatment of the diarrhœa among the poor: of organizing in every district affected by cholera what is called the system of house-to-house visitation; and of establishing temporary hospitals for the reception of patients who cannot be properly treated at their own houses; because these measures have been strongly and properly enforced in the 'notification' published by the General Board of Health."

Brutal.

"Man's inhumanity to man
Makes countless thousands mourn."

The most unfeeling and inhuman action which has ever come within our knowledge, was committed by the Captain of the steamer Michigan—St. Louis and New Orleans packet—last Tuesday night. On her trip from New Orleans to this place, the cholera broke out on deck, and numbers of the deck passengers were buried. When she landed here, she had on board we are informed, some fifteen or twenty cases; and one, an Irishman, pretty far gone. This man was commanded to leave the boat and was actually thrust ashore without reason or right. He got back on the boat, begged them to let him remain there—he was dying—was in a strange place—could get no accommodations, and a dreadful storm was coming up; but his entreaties were of no avail. Twice did he get on board that boat, and twice was he peremptorily commanded to leave her.

He did leave. He crawled up the levee and laid himself down to die. It was late at night, and few if any of the citizens knew anything of the transaction. We are told that one or two applications were made for shelter for the poor man, and were refused. We can hardly credit this—we can hardly believe that any man could be so unfeeling as to deny shelter to a fellow-creature, and that fellow-creature dying from want of attention. Be that as it may, the man laid out of doors all night, and during one of the most terrific thunder storms we have witnessed for a long time. He died the next morning about nine o'clock—died like a beast. For the credit of the town we should suppress this announcement; but as faithful chroniclers of passing events, we feel bound to give it publicity.

If the circumstances of this man's ejection from the Michigan, as related to us, are correct, the man who commands her should be discountenanced and shunned by all men of feeling or refinement, and held up to public loathing and contempt, there to remain

CONDITION OF CUBA.—A letter from a New Yorker in Cuba, which we find in the N. Y. Journal of Commerce, says that, having seen the principal parts of that island, and noted the fortifications and preparations for active war, he is satisfied that the people of the United States have been systematically deceived by publications which have intentionally misrepresented many things too obvious for mistake. There are twenty-four thousand regular troops on the island, and to these will soon be added three thousand negro troops, to be attached to each battalion as flank companies. The number of frigates, armed frigates, and "guarda costas," all well manned on the coast and in the harbor is four time greater than is generally known here, and there are also a number of vessels which may easily be converted into vessels of war from ten to twenty guns, besides which four steamers and six ships-of-the-line are now on the way to Cuba, in convoy of transports, with six thousand regular troops, one thousand of whom are artillerists. The writer adds:

A register of all the landholders and royalists, and those suspected, is in the hand of the Governor. All those who can be relied upon, and those suspected, are noted. In the hands of the former, arms will be placed in the event of invasion, and all suspected will be immediately arrested. The ammunition and arms are carefully guarded, and arrangements are made in case of trouble to pass all public and private treasure into the Moro Castle. The foolish young fellows in the States who join the fillibusters in expectation of plunder and easy conquest, will be disappointed—and, instead of realizing these expectations, will find defeat, death, or imprisonment.—The natives of the island, supposed to be friendly to revolution, are a feeble race, ignorant of military matters, without organization, arms, or concert—and will disappoint the expectations of their friends in the United States.—Louisville Journal.

CHOLERA AT TOLEDO, OHIO.—The Cleveland Leader of the 6th, learns that twenty-one deaths from cholera occurred in Toledo on the 6th, (the date is evidently a mistake.) The schooner Virginia left there with six men on the 2nd inst., for Oswego. By the next evening, two of the men had died of the disease and two more were sick. The captain had left the vessel and obtained assistance at Cleveland, to which port the vessel was towed. Four of the men died, and the captain and one man were attacked but recovered. The Leader says there are no cases in Cleveland.—Phil. Eve. Register.

ST. LOUIS.—The telegraph states that four hundred and seventy deaths occurred at St. Louis during the week ending the 3rd inst. A despatch from Cincinnati states on the authority of the St. Louis Republican of Tuesday that two hundred and seven of the deaths during the week were from cholera.

The St. Louis News of Monday has this paragraph:

"Jefferson City was visited last week by the chorera. In two days twelve or fourteen deaths had occurred.

It says nothing of the prevalence of the disease in St. Louis.

The Purpose of Reviving the Slave Trade Distinctly Avowed—Senator Slidell's Motion.

We took occasion to notice a few days since, the resolution reported by Mr. Slidell, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, proposing to give to England and France notice of the abrogation of the treaty stipulations by which we are bound to keep a naval force upon the African coast for the suppression of the slave trade. We stated then our approbation of this measure, from the conviction it is onerous to our country, destructive to our seamen engaged in this service, and utterly inefficient for the purposes intended. We also approve it for another reason, which we will state with perfect frankness to the people of this country. We have no sympathy in the purposes of this convention, and no wish for its success, and we think the time has come to speak out upon the subject. To practise slavery and yet suppress the slave trade—to contend that slavery is of advantage to the races which concur in its existenee, and yet resist the efforts by which the advantage is extended; to urge that the union of unequal races is necessary to the progress of human society, and yet resist the means by which that union is effected, is a contradiction which human ingenuity can never reconcile; and yet to such a contradiction the southern section of this country is compelled in every effort which looks to the discountenance and discouragement of the traffie with the coast of Africa by which the limits of this institution are extended.

That there is no moral wrong in slavery is the assumption which lies at the very base of that institution. It is the principle we establish when we show that both races are better under the influence of this institution than they are without, and in fact, the intelligent mind of the South is fast approaching the conclusion that slavery—the union of unequal races in the constitution of a social system—is the normal condition of human society.

It is fast becoming the belief that to advance, society must be composed of two classes—the one to direct, and the other to labor—and that to the permanence of society in positions of advancement, there must be a division in its numbers; and not that division simply which springs from the necessities of the case, where one part is held above its natural position by the accident of wealth, where the other is depressed below its natural level by the accident of its absence—but a division which is natural, and which necessarily results from the inequality between the races which are brought together. In this belief we heartily concur. The benefits and advantages which so far have resulted from this institution, we take as lights to guide us to the brighter truths of its future history. No nation on earth has been so favored as have been the people of these Southern States. None has so increased in wealth and numbers—none has been so free from domestic broils and civil commotion. In none has the laboring class been so happy and so free from physical suffering, and in none, between the higher and lower classes of society, has there been so much of kind feeling and so much of mutual solicitude and dependence. To bask in the brightening beams of such an institution, to defend it, to praise it and pray for its continuanee, and yet contribute ships and soldiers to prevent its extension and its spread to others than ourself, is scarcely defensible upon any reasonable principle of human action.

Feelings of a Woman.

How extensive and profound is the impression that has every where been made by the official kidnapping of Anthony Burns in Boston, and removal at the point of the bayonet, is forcibly illustrated by the following extract of a letter from one who, long since retired from public conspicuity, once occupied a distinguished place in the anti-slavery struggle, namely, Angelina Grimke Weld, wife of Theodore D. Weld, and daughter of the late Hon. Thos. S. Grimke, of Charleston, South Carolina. Writing to an esteemed friend in Brookline, Mass., she says:—

'But, dear brother, how utterly insignificant do all our personal affairs seem to be, when compared with the mighty interests which are at stake, and the great crisis which seems to be inevitably approaching our country and the world!

The passage of the Nebraska Bill, though expected, nevertheless falls heavily upon every heart which beats for liberty. It seems to have aroused the slumbering North as no other slave enactment ever did before. The scales at last have fallen from the blind eyes of thousands, who could not be reached by anything that abolitionists have said about the over-reaching and grasping cupidity of slavery.

The arrest of fugitives is the natural result of such a triumph in Congress; and although the shedding of human blood is utterly abhorrent to my mind, as barbarous and unchristian, yet the tame surrender of a helpless victim up to the fate of the slave is far more abhorrent; as slavery is equally, if not more, abhorrent to Christianity, than murder. In this case, it seems as though we are compelled to choose between two evils, and all that we can do is to take the least, and baptize liberty in blood, if it must be so. I confess that I would rather see twenty men killed than one poor fugitive returned into bondage: and I bless God that there were a Parker and a Phillips in Boston, fearless enough to utter the sedition they did in Faneuil Hall. Oh! that there were in every Northern city men as true, as bold as they were; and I sincerely hope that the arrest of every fugitive may be contested even unto blood. Not another slave should ever be surrendered. Liberty has too long been tampered with by those who professed to stand as a body-guard around her. It is time that the alarm-bell was rung through the Northern States, and that the holy resolution was solemnly, universally adopted, that, cost what it may, no fugitive from slavery should ever go back from Northern soil. But you may say a civil war must be the result of such a course. Yes, it would be; and if we cannot do our duty to the oppressed millions of our country and the world without war, let it come, both servile and civil: for I now entirely despair of the triumph of Justice and Humanity without the shedding of blood. A temporary war is an incomparably less evil than permanent slavery.

To surrender my own life to brute force is a bounty I may bestow upon the ruffian, if need be; but to surrender the flying fugitive, who confides to my hands that liberty which is dearer than life, is cowardly treachery to the trust he reposes in me; and I thereby prove myself unworthy of his confidence as a man and a brother. Do I amaze you by such a declaration of war against the principles of peace? I amaze myself? for I have clung to them with the greatest admiration and love; but it is so dear to my mind that we are now called upon to choose between slavery and war, and that the one is as much worse an evil than the other, that I have no hesitation as to which of them I am most sacredly and solemnly bound to choose. War, temporary war, rather than interminable slavery!

We talk about the desperate struggle which is before Europe; but, oh! is there not as desperate and bloody a struggle between us? Is the Slavery of America better than the Serfdom of Europe? Is the Autocrat of Russia any more bent upon the murder of Liberty in the East, than the Slaveholder is in the West? Can emancipation be effected here at any less price than it will cost there? Surely not! For the spirit of despodism is the same everywhere, whether it be in Austria or Carolina. It is the same in the Great Beast, diverse from all others, which threads down the poor and helpless, in every nation under heaven, and grinds them to powder. A Beast, indeed, too low in human development to be reached by the melting rays of truth and love.

It is indeed gratifying to find that civilization has so far progressed as to refuse to issue Letters of Marque; but humanity has been so long and so grievously outraged, that I fear Revenge will do its utmost in this great battle for the right.—Boston Liberator.

John Mitchell, who escaped from Australia, speaks in this wise of Bostonians who do not like the "Fugitive Slave Law":

"To compel a lazy, woolly-headed negro, to return to his master, and to work for a living, is the highest crime known to the 'higher laws.'

"But if the TRAITORS only received their desert in this world, the position to which they would be elevated is a gallows higher than the steeple. We rejoice that so far the majesty of the law has been vindicated, even at the point of the bayonet, but it would receive a higher and more salutary vindication, if the REBELS HAD BEEN SHOT DOWN LIKE DOGS, and to this complexion it must come at last!"

If it is right, according to the code and principle of conduct advocated by this renegade to freedom, to have the "Rebels" of Boston "shot down like dogs," what treatment ought the Irish rebel to receive for his attempts to procure better or worse laws; and if it is right to compel a man to go back into slavery, without a jury, what treatment should be meeted out to Mitchell himself, who ran away from confinement where he was not compelled to work? Charity inclines us to think that Mitchell is a little crazed, for certainly his sentiments smack more of the Lunatic Asylum than of the study of the reflective citizen.—Michigan Free Democrat.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now trimuphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great humrn family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GAIBBLE, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seccouded by the Rev. THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL RINGOLD WARD, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada afterlaffecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number.

Poetry.

A Wayside Dream.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

A warm and drowsy sweetness
Is steaming o'er my brain;
I see no more the Danube
Sweep through his royal plain—
I hear no more the peasant girls
Singing amid the grain!

Soft silvery wings, a moment
Seem resting on my brow;
Again I hear the water,
But its voice is deeper now,
And the mocking-bird and oriole
Are singing on the bough!

The elm and linden branches
Droop close and dark o'erhead,
And the foaming forest brooklet
Laps down its rocky bed;
Be still, my heart! the seas are passed—
The paths of home I tread!

The showers of dreamy blossoms
Are on the linden spray,
And down the clover meadow
They heap the scented hay,
And glad winds toss the forest leaves
All the bright summer day.

Old playmates! bid me welcome
Amid your brother-band:
Give me the old affection—
The glowing grasp of hand!
Worship no more the realms of old—
Here is my Father-land!

Miscellaneous.

Cholera.

The following communication is stated to have been made by a Clergyman to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland:—"My Lord,—As a simple but effectual preventive to the spread of Cholera, as well as a remedy of great power for those attacked with the disease, I venture to apply to your Lordship to have them known, should they appear, by trial as effectual as I have found them. As a Clergyman, I have had many instances of applying this remedy; and in no case did the patient die, the recovery being always speedy and perfect. I make no apology for venturing to address your Lordship, as the great importance of the subject will be, I trust, deemed sufficient. The preventive is simple: a teaspoonful of powdered charcoal taken three or four times a week in a cup of coffee, or other vehicle in the morning. When attacked with Cholera, a mixture of an ounce of charcoal, an ounce of laudanum, and an ounce of brandy or other spirits, may be given as follows—after being well shaken, a teaspoonful every five minutes. In half an hour, I have known this effectually to relieve and stay the disease, as the patient becomes better, the mixture may be given at longer intervals. I have known a patient in the blue stage and collapsed, perfectly recovered in a few hours. The above was tried as a preventive on a large plantation in the Mauritius, and not a single individual out of eight hundred was attacked with the Cholera."

A Little Child among Lunatics.

A day or two ago a gentleman whose official duties required him to visit a large Asylum near this city, devoted to the indigent insane, took with him a little boy some three years old, and it was an interesting study to watch the effect which the presence of the young visitor produced among lunatics of every grade. An unusual degree of quiet and order prevailed in every hall, and touching manifestations of the softening and subduing influence of childhood were exhibited by those who were ordinarily most intractable. This was particularly the case with those who had passed the season of youth. One man, incurably insane, approached the little boy with a countenance for the moment full of gentleness and kindness, and with a polite gesture handed him a straw—being all he had to give—and showed great satisfaction when it was accepted, and borne as if it had been of value. Almost all approached and shook hands with the infant, and so mild was their bearing that he did not for a moment hesitate, and although abashed at what was to him an unusual crowd, he cheerfully yielded his little hand to their caresses.

But the most interesting scene was in the women's apartments. They were ready to devour the child with their caresses, and yet when they observed that their crowding and volubility annoyed him, instinctively withdrew a little and modulated their voices to tones of tenderness, to which many of them had long been strangers. One of the women, herself a mother, inquired with tearful eyes—"Dear little fellow, is his mother living?" An affirmative reply seemed to relieve her apprehensions, and expression of interest assumed a more cheerful tone. The most violent, closely confined in cells, watched every movement of the boy with intense interest, and some begged, by all the affection for their own offspring—which insanity in its worst form had not eradicated—to be permitted to embrace him. The whole scene was calculated to deepen the sympathy felt for the most unfortunate class who were the object of the visit; and to show how strongly the society of children is calculated to win back to gentleness those who, from any cause, have passed that indefinable line which separates the sane from the insane. Such soothing effects are of course transient, but it was something to obtain for those poor vexed souls even a moment of calm delight.—N. Y. Courier.

What Doctors Say about Chickens.

"In regard to the more common disease, the pip, Mr. Newall, of Rochester, N. Y., said before the National Poultry Society, had found the most effectual treatment to be anointing the head of the fowl with a mixture of equal parts of lard and spirits of turpentine. He also administers two or three of Lee's anti-billious pills. Other gentlemen used castor oil with good results. One gentleman had found the best treatment for bad cases of this disease was to doctor them as the Dutchman did his dog, cut off the tail just back of the ears.

"Dr. McClintock, of Philadelphia, one of the oldest and formerly the most extensive breeders in the country, gave several items from his experience. He had kept a daily written record of the transactions in his poultry-yard. Among other items he stated that one Shanghai pullet, beginning at 6 months old, had laid 49 eggs in 61 days. The mother of this chick had in 140 days laid 77 eggs and hatched three broods of chickens.—He said he never raised fowls for sale, and and not being influenced by interest, he would say, as the result of his long experience and observation, that if a person could keep only one pair of fowls, they should be the gray Shanghais (Brahma Pootras.)—Mr. North of New Haven, looking to beauty as well as profit, preferred the Bolton Gray. Considerable friendly discussion was had upon the different names given to the same varieties. The matter was settled by unanimously adopting the resolution below. This resolution was first presented with a preamble, which was left off for the sake of brevity. The preamble gave as a reason for adopting the name 'Shanghai,' in preference to 'Asiatic,' that most fowls were of Asiatic origin, and that most of the larger fowls had been imported from Shanghai. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the National Poultry Society recommend that all Asiatic fowls known by the name of Shanghais, Cochin Chinas, Brahma Pootras, or Chittegongs, be hereafter called Shanghais, being divided only by variations of colour.

"Another resolution was adopted with the same unanimity, recommending to call all crested fowls, Polands.

The following recipe for smallpox, scarlatina, and measles, is going the rounds of the papers. We publish it as we find it, knowing nothing of its virtues:

"Take one grain each of powdered foxglove or digitalis (valuable in the ratio of its greenness, the dark should be rejected) and one of sulphate of zinc, (this article is commonly known as white vitriol.) These should be rubbed thoroughly in a mortar, or any other convenient vessel, with four or five drops of water; this done, a noggin (or about four ounces) more, with some syrup of sugar, should be added. Of this, a table-spoonful should be given to an adult, and two teaspoonfuls to a child, every second hour, until symptoms of disease vanish.

ELOQUENT BUT INARTICULATE.—A little while ago we passed a half hour in a village graveyard, reading the inscriptions on those tables of the law of "dust to dust." Upon one of them carved in marble, was a chain. Of the nine links composing it, one was broken. How legible the characters! How intelligible the language! In that family there were nine once—a beautiful chain of affection, richer than gold, but death had unloosed one link, and the broken jewelry of the hearth and the heart had glittered with the dews distilled from loving eyes. Broken jewelry! How many such trinkets of memory and affection there are in the homes of the world—souvenirs, whose possession should render humanity hallowed. Grief makes sacred those upon whom its hand is laid.—Joy may elevate, ambition glorify, but sorrow alone can consecrate.

BRIGHT AND GLOOMY HOURS.—Ah! this beautiful world. Indeed I know not what to think of it. Sometimes it is all gladness and sunshine, and heaven itself is not far off. And then it changes suddenly and is dark and sorrowful and the clouds shut out the sky. In the lives of the saddest of us there are bright days and when we feel as if we could take the great world in our arms.—Then come the gloomy hours when the fire will neither burn in our hearts nor on our hearth; and all within and without is dismal, cold and dark. Believe me, every heart has its secret sorrows which the world knows not, and oftentimes we call a man cold when he is only sad.—Longfellow.

A YELLOW WASH FOR WALLS is made by taking a quarter of a pound of chrome yellow, a quarter of a pound of gum senegal, and two pounds of whiting. These, dissolved in pure rain water will form an excellent yellow wash.

ADVERTISING IN THE TIMES.—A column of advertising in the Times is said to be worth £6,000 sterling a year.

NEW CURE FOR BURNS.—Mr. Bronson, of Meadville, Pa., says, from fifteen years experience, he finds that Indian meal poultice covered over with young hyson tea, softened with hot water, and laid over burns or frozen flesh, as hot as can be borne, will relieve the pain in five minutes. If blisters have not risen before they will not after it is put on, and that one poultice is generally sufficient to effect a cure.—Scientific American.

INFERNAL MACHINE.—A "longitudinal projectile" has been submitted to the English Board of Ordinance. It is about four feet in length, may be fired from a cannon, and will "hit to a hair," any object at the distance of five miles; on being shot from the cannon it expands like an umbrella, explodes the moment it alights, and causes instant annihilation to every material for many yards around. It will, it is said, cause the immediate destruction of the largest ship in the world; and one or two charges would, in a few seconds extirpate the finest army that ever marched to music.—N. O. Delta.

RULES FOR REDUCING ACRES TO SQUARE MILES.—Cut off three figures from the right and increase the remainder by fifty-six and a quarter per cent: thus, 16,000 square acres. Cut off three, the remainder is 16. Add 8, which is fifty per cent, the sum is 24. Again add 1, which is six and a quarter per cent., and you have 25 square miles. 25x640=16,000.

A FINE OLD IRISH GENTLEMAN.—The Freeman says: "Owen Duffy, of Monaghan County, is 122 years old. When 116 he lost his second wife, and subsequently married a third, by whom he had a son and daughter. The youngest son is two years old, his eldest ninety. He still retains, in much vigor, his mental and corporeal faculties, and frequently walks to the country town, a distance of eight miles."

ANECDOTE OF THE RAVEN.—One day, a person, travelling through the forest to Winchester, was much surprised to hear the following exclamation, "Fair play, gentlemen! fair play! For God's sake, gentlemen, fair play!" The traveller looking round to discover from whence the voice came, to his great astonishment, beheld no human being near. But hearing the cry of "Fair play" repeated, he thought it must proceed from some creature in distress. He immediately rushed into that part of the forest whence the cries came, when, to his astonishment, he beheld two ravens combatting a third with great fury, while the sufferer, which proved to be a tame one belonging to a gentleman in the neighbourhood, kept loudly vociferating "Fair play;" which so interested the traveller, that he instantly rescued the oppressed bird.

Young man, a private word. When you go a courting, find out as soon as possible, whether your affections are being placed more in a bundle of dry goods and things generally, than in a pulsating heart, hemmed in by warm ribs, and all that. Many a fellow has laid himself out for a full made woman, and only found an extensive assortment of cotton, whalebone, and similar delusive institutions. Just look over the goods before going to the parson.—Exchange.

DERIVATION OF BUSS.—Buss: to kiss: Rebuss: to kiss again. Blunderbuss two girls kissing each other. Omnibuss: to kiss all the girls in the room.

The author of the following evidently doesn't care a fig for the good opinion of the ladies:

"When dressed for the evening, the girls, now a days,
Scarce an atom of dress on them leave;
None blame them—for what is an evening dress,
But a dress that is suited for Eve."

Constitution of the National Council.

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS,
JOHN D. PECK,
AMOS G. BEMAN,
JOHN JONES,
J. D. BONNER,
J. MCCUNE SMITH,
Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL."

2. The foundation fund shall be thirty thousand dollars.

3. Twenty thousand dollars shall be in stock of 2000 shares, at ten dollars per share.

4. Ten thousand dollars shall be in donations to be solicited from the friends of the cause.

5. The shares shall be payable, ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and ten per cent. every first day of July, October, January and April thereafter, until the whole is paid in.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

The agent appointed by the Committee Frederick Douglass, Esq., shall be empowered to receive donations and take subscriptions for stock, giving a receipt for the latter, signed by himself and Rev. Amos G. Beman, the Secretary of the Committee. For his services, the Agent shall receive five per cent. on all stock instalments paid in by him, and ten per cent. on all donations above two hundred dollars paid in by or through him.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Aliened American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Lately, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-khown literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writere in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the TRIBUNE'S Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR

A

NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION

OF

COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

MEN AND BRETHREN.—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means a lequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted rights, composing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the ruling element of society in which we live. The policy necessary to the preservation of this element must be in our favor, if ever we expect the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures and objects set forth in this Call as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. If not, then, there is no part of the wide-spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, fair names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

The Counterfeit adway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

Sabbath Morning.

BY WILLIAM BYRNE.

'Tis Sabbath morn—the solemn sound of bells
Is borne upon the quiet holy breeze,
From hallow'd churches, that in yonder dells
Lift up their heads, half hidden by the trees,—
The birds, methinks, sing with a sweeter lay,
And that the sun shines brighter on the Sabbath day!

The streamlet with a clearer ripple flows—
The very flowers a richer perfume yield;
Even the cawing of the stately crows
That undisturb'd strut o'er the new-ploughed field
Seems musical to me, while in the grove
With a more dreamy sound the rustling branches move.

All toil is o'er—I miss the blacksmith's stroke—
The anvil's ring—the carter's noisy song—
The forge's roar—and e'en its wreath of smoke
Now curls no more yon fir-tree boughs among—
The noisy mill, too, for a time doth cease,
And all things tell alone to rest and holy peace!

But now the bells are silent:—and appear—
(Within that sacred building old and gray)—
The honest rustics, who are met to hear
The word of God, and keep his holy day.
'Tis sweet to see the group assembled there—
The youth—and timid maid—and those with silver hair!

Through the stain'd windows the glad sunshine streams
Upon the Gothic pillars,—worn and old,
And on each lettered arch, until it seems
That they are built of precious stones and gold!—
And casting on the floor, in colours faint,
The shadowy outline of some rudely pictured saint!

Though few they are and simple there that raise
Their voice to heaven, responding to the prayer—
Nor pealing organ mingles with their praise—
Yet think not thou that God the less is there!
For He hath said—"Wherever two or three
Are gathered in my name, there in the midst I'll be!"

Oh! there is so a thing in a Sabbath morn—
As if a charm to sweet time were given—
To wean the mind from all that's earthly born,
And lift the heart adoringly to heaven—
Making the spirit strive to break the chain
That binds it to this life of chequered joy and pain.

Give me Back my Husband.

BY ELIHU BURRITT.

Not many years since, a young married couple from the far, "fast-anchored isle," sought our shores with the most sanguine anticipations of prosperity and happiness.—They had begun to realize more than they had seen in the visions of hope, when, in an evil hour, the husband was tempted "to look upon the wine when it was red," and to taste it "when it gives its colour in the cup."—The charmer fastened around his victim all the serpent spells of its sorcery, and he fell, and, he fell, and he fell, and, at every step of his rapid degradation from the man to the brute, and downward, a heartstring broke in the bosom of his companion.

Finally, with the last spark of hope flickering on the altar of her heart, she threaded her way into one of those shambles where man is made such a thing as the beasts of the field would bellow at. She pressed her way through the Bacchanalian crowd who were revelling there in their own ruin. With her bosom full of "that perilous stuff that preys upon the heart," she stood before the plunderer of her husband's destiny, and exclaimed in tones of startling anguish, "Give me back my husband!"

"There's your husband," said the man, as he pointed towards the prostrate wretch.—"That my husband! What have you done to him? That my husband! What have you done to that noble form that once, like a giant oak, held its protecting shade over the fragile vine that clung to it for support and shelter? That my husband! With what torpedo chill have you touched the sinews of that manly arm? That my husband! What have you done to that once noble brow, which he wore high among his fellows, as if it bore the superscription of the Godhead? That my husband! What have you done to that eye, with which he was wont to 'look erect on heaven,' and see in his mirror the image of his God? What Egyptian drug have you poured into his veins, and turned the pure fountains of the heart into black and burning pitch! Give me back my husband! Reverse your basilisk spells, and give me back the man that stood with me by the altar!"

The ears of the rum-seller, ever since the first demijohn of that burning liquid was opened upon our shores, have been saluted with just such appeals as this. Such wives, such widows, and mothers, such fatherless children, as never mourned in Israel, at the massacre of Bethlehem, or at the burning of the Temple, have cried in his ears, morning, night, and evening, "Give me back my husband! Give me back my boy! Give me back my brother!"

But has the rum-seller been confounded or speechless at these appeals? No! not he. He could show his credentials at a moment's notice, with proud defiance.—He always carried in his pocket a written absolution for all he had done, and could do, in his work of destruction. He had bought a letter of indulgence! I mean a license! a precious instrument, signed and sealed by an authority more stronger and more respectable than the people's. He confounded! Why, the whole artillery of civil power was ready to open in his defence and support. Thus shielded by the Ægis of the law, he had nothing to fear from the enemies of his traffic. He had the image and superscription of Cæsar on his credentials, and unto Cæsar he appealed, and unto Cæsar too, his victims appealed, and appealed in vain.

From Bentley's (London) Miscellany

Kissing in the Dark.

The 10-15 train glided from Paddington, May 1st, 1847. In the left compartment of a certain first-class carriage were four passengers; of these singularly enough, two were worth description. The lady had a smooth, white delicate brow, strongly marked eyebrows, long lashes, eyes that seemed to change color, and a good-sized delicious mouth, with teeth as white as milk. A man could not see her nose for her eyes and mouth, could and would have told us some nonsense about it. She wore an unpretending grayish dress, buttoned to the throat, with long-shaped buttons, a Scotch shawl that agreeably evaded the responsibility of color. She was like a duck, so tight her plain feathers fitted her; and there she sat, smooth, snug, and delicious, with a book in her hand, and a soupcon of her snowy wrist just visible as she held it. Her opposite neighbor was what I call a good style of man—the more to his credit, since he belonged to a corporation, that turns out the very worst imaginable style of young men. He was a cavalry officer, aged twenty-five. He had a moustache, but not a very repulsive one; it was far from being one of those sub-nasal pig-tails, on which soup is suspended like dew on a shrub; it was short, thick, and black as a coat. His teeth had not yet been turned by tobacco smoke to the color of tobacco juice, his clothes did not stick nor hang to him—they sat on him; he had an engaging smile, and what I liked the dog for, his vanity, which was inordinate, was in its proper place; his heart not in his face, jostling mine and other people's, who have none: in a word, he was what one oftner hears of than meets—a young gentleman. He was conversing in an animated whisper with a companion, a fellow officer—they were talking about, what it is far better not to do, women. Our friend clearly did not wish to be overheard, for he cast ever and anon a fertile glance at his fair "vis-a-vis," and lowered his voice. She seemed completely absorbed in her book, and that re-assured him. At last the two soldiers came down to a whisper, and in that whisper, (the truth must be told) the one who got down at Slough and was lost in posterty, bet ten pounds to three, that he who was going down with us to Bath and immortality would not kiss either of the ladies opposite upon the road.—"Done!" Now I am sorry a man I have hitherto praised, should have lent himself, even in a whisper, to such a speculation; but 'nobody is wise at all hours,' not even when the clock is striking five-and-twenty; and you are to consider his profession, his good looks, and the temptation—ten to three.

After Slough the party was reduced to three; at Twyford one lady dropped her handkerchief; Captain Dolignan fell on it like a tiger and returned it like a lamb; two or three words were interchanged on that occasion. At Reading, the Marlborough of our tale, made one of the safe investments of the day; he bought a Times and a Punch, the latter was full of steel pen thrusts and wood-cuts. Valor and beauty deigned to laugh at some inflated humbug or other punctuated by Punch. Now, laughing together, thaws our human ice; long before Swindon it was a talking-match.—at Swindon who so devoted as Captain Dolignan; he handed them out—he souped them—he tough chickened them—he brandied them, and cochincaled one—and he brandied and burnt sugared the other; on their return to the carriage, one lady passed into the inner apartment to inspect a certain gentleman's seat on that side of the line.

Reader, had it been you or I, the beauty would have been the deserter, the average one would have stayed with us, till all was blue, ourselves included; not more surely does our slice of bread and butter, when it escapes from our hand, revolve it ever so often, alight face downward on the carpet. But this was a bit of a fop. Adonis dragoon—so Venus remained in 'tete-a-tete,' with him. Presently our Captain looked out of the window and laughed; this elicited an enquiring look from Miss Haythorn.

'We are only a mile from the Box Tunnel.'

'Do you always laugh a mile from the Box Tunnel?' said the lady.

'Invariably.'

'What for.'

'Why! hem! it is a gentleman's joke.'

'Oh! I don't mind its being silly if it makes me laugh.' Captain Doligan thus encouraged, recounted to Miss Haythorn the following:

'A lady and her husband sat together going through the Box Tunnel—there was one gentleman opposite, it was pitch dark; after the Tunnel, the lady said, 'George how absurd of you to salute me going through the Tunnel.' 'I did no such thing!' 'You didn't!' 'No! why?'—'Why, because somehow I thought you did!' Here Capt. Doligan laughed, and endeavored to lead his companion to laugh, but it was not to be done. The train entered the Tunnel.

Miss Haythorn—'Ah!'

Doligan—'What is the matter?'

Miss H.—'I am frightened.'

Doliy. (moving to her side)—'Pray do not be alarmed, I am near you.'

Miss H.—'You are near me, very near me, indeed, Capt. Dolignan.'

Doliy.—'You know my name!'

Miss H.—'I heard your friend mention it. I wish we were out of this dark place.'

Doliy.—'I could be content to spend hours here re-assuring you, sweet lady.

Miss H.—'Nonsense.'

Doliy.—'Pweep! (Grave reader, do not put your lips to the cheek of the next pretty creature you meet, or you will undestand what this means.)

Miss H.—'Ee!'

'Friend—What is the matter?'

Miss H.—'Open the door! open the door!

There was a sound of hurried whispers, the door was shut, and the blind pulled down with hostile sharpness.

If any critic falls on me for putting in articulate sounds in a dialogue as above, I answer with all the insolence I can command at present, 'Hit boys as big as yourself,' bigger perhaps, such as Sophocles, Euripides, and Aristophanes; they began it, and I learned it of them, 'sore against my will.'

Miss Haythorn's scream lost part of its effect, because the engine whistled forty thousand murders at the same moment, and fictitious grief makes itself heard when real cannot.

Between the Tunnel and Bath our young friend had time to ask himself whether his conduct had been marked by that delicate reserve which is supposed to distinguish the perfect gentleman.

With a long face, real or feigned, he held open the door; his late friends attempted to escape on the other side,—impossible! they must pass him. She whom he had insulted (Latin for kissing) deposited somewhere at his feet a look of gentle blushing reproach; the other, whom he had not insulted, darted red hot daggers at him from her eyes, and so they parted.

It was, perhaps, forunate for Dolignan that he had the grace to be friends with Major Hoskyns, of his regiment, a veteran laughed at by the youngsters, for the Major was too apt to look cannon balls and linstocks; he had also to tell the truth, swallowed a good bit of the mess-room poker, which made it as impossible for Major Hoskyns to descend to an ungentlemanlike word or action, as it was to brush his own trousers below the knee.

Captain Dolignan told this gentleman his story in gleeful accents; but Major Hoskyns heard him coldly, and as coldly answered that he had known a man lose his life for the very same thing; 'That is nothing,' continued, the Major, 'but unfortunately he deserved it.'

At this the blood mounted to the young man's temples, and his senior added, 'I mean to say he was fifty-five, you I presume, are twenty-one?'

'Twenty-five.'

'That is much the same thing; will you be advised by me?'

'If you will advise me.'

'Speak to no one of this and send White the £3, that he may think you have lost the bet.'

'That is hard when I won it.'

'Do it for all that, sir.'

Let the disbelievers in human perfectibility know that this dragoon, capable of blush, did this virtuous action, albeit with violent reluctance, and this was his first damper. A week after these events he was at a ball not the first since his return 'bien entendu.' He was in that fictitious discontent which belongs to us amiable English. He was looking in vain for a lady, equal in personal attractions to the idea he had formed of George Dolignan as a man, when suddenly there glided past him a most delightful vision! a lady whose beauty and symmetry took him by the eyes—another look: "It can't be!"—"Yes it is!" Miss Haythorn! (not that he knew her name!) but what an apotheosis!

The duck had become a pea-hen—radiant, dazzling, she looked twice as beautiful and almost twice as large as before. He lost sight of her. He found her again. She was so lovely she made him ill—and he, alone, must not dance with her or speak to her. If he had been content to begin her acquaintance the usual way, it might have ended in kissing, but having begun with kissing, it must end with nothing. As she glanced, sparks of beauty fell from her on all around but him—she did not see him; it was clear she never would see him. One gentleman was particularly assiduous; she smiled on his assiduity; he was ugly, but she smiled on him. Dolignan was surprised at his success, his ill taste, his ugliness, his impertinence. Dolignan at last found himself injured. "Who was this man?" and "what right had he to go on so?" "He had never kissed her I suppose," said Dolly. Dolignan could not prove it, but he felt that somehow the rights of property were invaded. He went home and dreamed of Miss Haythorn, hated all the ugly successful. He never could encounter her again. At last heard of her, in this way; a lawyer's clerk paid him a visit and commenced a little action against him in the name of Miss Haythorn, for insulting her in a railway car.

The young gentleman was shocked, endeavored to soften the lawyer's clerk; that machine did not thoroughly comprehend the meaning of the term. The lady's name, however, was at least revealed by this untoward incident; from her name to her address, was but a short step; and the same day, our crest-falled hero lay in wait at her door—and many a succeeding day without effect. But one fine afternoon, she issued forth quite naturally, as if she did every day, and walked briskly on the nearest parade.—Dolignan did the same, he met and passed her many times on the parade, and searched for pity in her eyes, but found neither look, nor recognition, nor any other sentiment; for all this she walked and walked, till all the other promenaders were tired and gone—then her culprit summonned resolution, and taking off his hat, with his voice tremulous for the first time, besought permission to address her. She stopped, blushed, but neither acknowledged or disowned his acquaintance. He blushed, stammered out how ashamed he was, how he deserved to be punished, how he was punished, how little she knew how unhappy he was, and concluded by begging not to let all the world know the disgrace of a man, who was already mortified enough by the loss of her acquaintance. She asked an explanation; he told her the action that had been commenced in her name; she gently shrugged her shoulders, and said, "How stupid they are."—Emboldened by this, he begged to know whether or not a life of discontent, unpretending devotion would, after a lapse of years, erase the memory of his madness—his crime!

"She did not know—!"

"She must now bid him adieu, as she had some preparations to make for a ball in the Crescent where everybody was to be." They parted, and Dolignan determined to be at the ball, where everybody was to be.—He was there, and after some time obtained an introduction to Miss Haythorn, and danced with her. Her manner was gracious. With the wonderful tact of her sex, she seemed to have commenced the acquaintance that evening. That night, for the first time, Dolignan was in love. I will spare the reader all a lover's arts, by which he succeeded in dining where she dined, in dancing where she danced, in overtaking her by accident when she rode. His devotion followed her even to church, where our dragoon was rewarded by learning there is a world where they neither poke nor smoke,—the two capital abominations of this one.

He made acquaintance with her uncle, who liked him, and he saw at last with joy, that her eye loved to dwell on him—when she thought he did not observe her.

It was three months after the Box Tunnel, that Captain Dolignan called one day upon Captain Haythorn, R. N. whom he had met twice in his life, and slightly propitiated by violent listening to a cutting-out expedition: he called, and in the usual way asked permission to pay his addresses to his daughter. The worthy Captain straightway began doing Quarter-Deck, when suddenly he was summoned from the apartment by a mysterious message. On his return he announced, with a total change of voice, that "It was all right and his visitor might run alongside as soon as he chose." My reader has divined the truth: this nautical commander, terrible to the foe, was in a complete and happy subjugation to his daughter, our heroine.

As he was taking leave, Dolignan saw his divinity glide into the drawing room. He followed her, observed the sweet conciousness deepened into confusion—she tried to laugh, she cried instead, and then smiled again; and when he kissed her hand at the door it was 'George' and 'Marian,' instead of Captain this and Miss the other. A reasonable time after this, (for my tale is merciful and skips formalities and torturing delays) —these two were very happy—they were once more upon the railroad going to enjoy their honeymoon all by themselves, Marian Dolignan was dressed just as before—duck-like, and delicious; all bright except her clothes; but George sat beside this time instead of opposite; and she drank him in gently, from under her long eyelashes.—"Marian," said George, "married people should tell each other all. Will you ever forgive me if I own to you—no—"

"Yes! yes!"

"Well, then, you remember the Box Tunnel," (this was the first allusion he had ventured to it)—"I am ashamed to say—I had a bet £3 to £10 with White, I would kiss one of you two ladies."

"I know that, George, I overheard you," was the demure reply.

"Oh! you overheard me? impossible!"

"And did you not hear me whisper to my companion? I made a bet with her."

"You made a bet, how singular! What was it!"

"Only a pair of gloves, George."

"Yes, I know, but what about it?"

"That if you did, you should be my husband, dearest."

"Oh!—but stay—then you could not have been so very angry with me, love; why dearest, then who brought that action against me?"

Mrs. Dolignan looked down.

"I was afraid you were forgetting!—George you will never forgive me!"

"Sweet angel—why here is Box Tunnel."

Now reader—fie!—no! no such thing! You can't expect to be indulged in this way every time we come to a dark place—besides it is not the thing. Consider two married people—no such phenomenon, I assure you took place. No scream issued in hopeless rivalry of the engine—this time!

Rothschild and Palestine.

It is rumoured in Paris that M. de Rothschild had offered to accept the terms proposed for the Turkish loan, or even to advance a larger sum, provided a mortgage was given on Palestine.

This rumour is highly suggestive. Every reflecting Christian must have had frequent thoughts of the Jews of Palestine, and of the precious promises and prophecies laid up for them in the Bible, during the thickening of the war plot, which now must inevitably involve all Europe. The great battle of Armageddon—the angel standing in the sun calling all the fowls to the feast of the great God—the treading of the wine-press without the city, and the blood coming to the horses' bridles, are passages of Holy Writ that come up before the mind with awful grandeur, clothed with the idea of a possible fulfilment within a short time! Palestine is the Lord's inheritance, reserved for the seed of Abraham. The Turkish power holds it. Its downfall is imminent; and who next shall own Palestine? Evidently the Jews.

The world has wondered at the wealth of the Rothschilds. They are Jews. Why has Providence raised them up and placed in their hands an amount of wealth equal to many an entire kingdom? May it not be for such a time as this? The Turkish power, straightened for money to fight again Russia, comes to one of the Jews to borrow—he asks a mortgage on Palestine; and on this condition offers more money than Turkey asks. The Sultan, knowing Palestine is one portion of his dominions on which the Emperor of Russia has fixed his covetous eyes, that he may command the Mediterranean and Red Seas, and also the mouth of the Nile, would the more readily mortgage it to Rothschild, to put it as far from the enemy as possible, and identify it with the interests of Western Europe, and by this means the more effectually to secure the aid of France. In the event Turkey is swallowed up—the mortgage lies unredeemed—Palestine is once more the property of an Israelite. But Russia is determined to have it; but to obtain it she must fight all Europe—and the last great conflict is on this sacred ground. New forms of government arise all over Europe, and the Jews return to their fatherland under the deed of Rothschild. These are thoughts which quickly sprung up in our minds upon reading the above few lines.—Vermont Chronicle.

How Foreigners are treated in Russia.

The letters of all foreigners residing in Russia are invariably opened, examined and read, both on being sent off and on being received, by the post office authorities. Any one who is unfortunately so imprudent as to relate the impressions produced upon him in the course of his travels through the country, or who maintains with persons abroad a correspondence which the Russian police look upon as dangerous, is quickly conducted to the frontier with all the respect due him according to the rank he holds in the social hierarchy.

Some years ago, Mons. V., the brother of a French superior officer, happened to be at St. Petersburgh. He had been stopping there above a fortnight, going about everywhere, and observing everything, when one morning a police officer entered his room and asked if it was Mons. V., to whom he had the honour of speaking. On the latter answering in the affirmative, the officer continued:

"His Majesty, the Emperor of all the Russias, having learned indirectly that you keep up with your brother an active correspondence in which you give your own peculiar views of the affairs of this country, charged me to inform you that, as your letters might be lost upon the road, he thinks it would be more prudent for you to carry them to Paris yourself. Here are your letters, a carriage and horses are waiting for you at the door. I have also a passport perfectly correct to give you. In two hours your trunks will be packed and we will set out.

This ironical manner of expelling people did not surprise Mons. V., for he was aware that it was a custom of the Russian police, and he replied, therefore, in the same tone to the officer:

"His Majesty anticipated my wishes, I was on the point of leaving his dominions, but I had indulged in the hope of not taking my departure until I had seen the Czar of all the Russias. I confess that I shall regret all my life not having time to do so."

"For the matter of that sir," replied the police officer, "while we are preparing your trunks, I will despatch some one to learn his Majesty's orders."

Speaking thus, he wrote a few lines on the page of his note book, and sent them off by a Cossack who had accompanied him, and who is the indispensible acolyte of every officer charged with a mission of this description.—Half an hour afterwards, the Cossack returned with the same note, at the bottom of which were; "Granted. To-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, in the Michael Riding School, the carriage will follow you."

The officer left Mons. V., to himself for the rest of the day, and returned to fetch him the next morning at half past 9. In a moment the baggage was stowed away, and Mons. V., and his cicerone directed their course towards the Riding School. The Emperor was already there inspecting a regiment of infantry. He passed several times before Mons. V., who was standing in the midst of a group of general officers. When the review was over, Mons. V., and his companion got into their carriage and drove off at a gallop, whirled along by four little horses of the Steppes, harnessed abreast.

On their reaching the frontier, the portcullis was raised to allow free passage to a carriage with the arms of the Czar upon it, and fifty paces further Mons. V., was set down with all his baggage before the Prussian barrier, in the middle of the road, at one o'clock of a bitter cold morning, in the month of November. The officer said that his Majesty only undertook the responsibility of such journeys as far as the frontiers of his dominions, and that at present Mons. V., must look to the King of Prussia for the means of pursuing his journey to France.

St. Petersburg as it is.

A letter appears in the Eberfield Gazette, from Dortmund, dated June 13. The writer says:

"The foreman of a large engine manufactory, who has lately returned from St. Petersburg, has given me the following statement: Everything now looks very gloomy in St. Petersburg, in doors and out of doors. The city, once beautiful and full of life, is no longer to be recognised. The palaces are converted into barracks, the bridges broken down, and the streets are covered with tents, for more than 40,000 Baskeers are said to have come from the governments of Orenburg and Perm, from their steppes and nomad encampments, for the defence of the capital, where they make a hideous impression. Whether their numbers are really so great as assigned, I cannot take upon myself to affirm, but they might if every man of them had been brought for the Bushkeers, in 1853, were set down at 29,000 families. They have still the Tartar weapons of bows and arrows, of lance and bill-hook, and will, therefore, make capital food for powder. They steal more dexterously than the crows, and they possess all the other Tartar virtues, theoretically and practically. But the proud and magnificent guard has gone away, partly to Poland and partly to Finland, and thus, in the total absence of life and daily intercourse, the city looks desolate. On the broad and glorious Neva stream, which once during the clear summer nights, afforded one of the most enchanting sights, which bore on its dark waters thousands of ships and boats, a solitary barge filled with bricks is now towed along, or a steamer runs down laden with troops for Cronstadt. As the city is in a state of war, no person is allowed to show himself in the streets after nine o'clock at night—a hard blow now to these poor northerners, who for more than half the year have been forced to keep their stove-warmed rooms. The higher classes of society are said to be quite out of tune, for to be always obliged to be making voluntary and involuntary sacrifices without receiving anything in return, is not exactly very edifying. Besides there seems no end to the whole business, and not a soul will give a rag on tick to another any longer. The common people, however, are fanaticised. Our dear papa, Czar knows best, is a proverb, and grim rage do they feel at the foreigners, whom they insult in the open street, and whom the police are constantly obliged to warn not to go beyond the gates of the city, where they could no longer be protected. For the rest, the foreigners have been obliged to sign a printed form, by which they were compelled to engage that they would submit in everything to the laws of the land, and suffer themselves to be tried and judged by them in case of their transgressing them. Trade is stagnant—all manufactories are at a stand-still, for among other causes there is no coals. What stock there was of them has been reserved by the authorities for the sole use of the steamers, though their price has gone up immensely. For this reason most of the foreign factory inspectors and workmen are leaving the country. The crowds are so great, wanting to take places in the coach running daily to Memel, that if a person does not book his place six weeks beforehand he stands a poor chance of getting away. Strangers who have money in the bank find great difficulty in getting it, for the bank pays out to no person whatever per day more than 50 silver roubles. In this way a poor Frenchman, who wanted to draw out the hard-earned savings of many years, namely 1,500 silver roubles, was obliged to run backward and forward for more than a month, having to wait every morning in the crowd till he could get served before he could get back his own again, though he had lost thereby the place he had booked and paid for at the coach-office weeks before. These things are all sad enough, and may perhaps incline the Czar to a truce, and then to peace, but they must be taken advantage of, so that he may be kept within due bounds for the future."

Arrest for Kidnapping.

FONDA, July 7, 1854.

To the Editors of the Evening Post:

A man by the name of Merrill was arrested to-day at Gloversville, Fulton county, charged with kidnapping Solomon Northrup, the slave. Your readers have doubtless seen or heard of the book entitled, "Solomon Northrup: or, Twelve Years a Slave." The book states how Solomon was inveigled and enticed away, and sold into slavery some fifteen years ago. Henry B. Northrup, Esq. of Sandy Hill, Washington county, in whose family Sol was brought up, expended a large sum of money in ascertaining the whereabouts of the colored boy, and after twelve years of search he found and rescued him from the curse of slavery.

Not satisfied with procuring the freedom of Sol, he has been for two years endeavoring to ferret out and bring to justice the wretch who, for the sake of gain, trafficked in human flesh by deliberately selling a free man into bondage. The person upon whom suspicion rested, had recently made his appearance in this vicinity, and the arrest was made this morning at the above place. The prisoner was armed with pistols and bowie knives, but so prompt was the arrest that he had not time to use them. He is reported to be a real desperado, and had he the least suspicion of being arrested, would no doubt have used his weapons freely. The negro identified him the moment he got his eye upon him. The constable was so down [illegible] and I will send the result to you as soon as I ascertain the facts. C.

Ladies' Names.

There is a strange deformity, combined with countless graces,
As often in the ladies' names as in the ladies' faces;
Some names are fit for every age, some only fit for youth,
Some passing sweet and musical, some horribly uncouth;
Some fit for dames of loftiest grades,
Some only fit for scullery-maids.
Ann is too blunt and common, and Nancy sounds but ill,
Yet Anna is endurable, and Annie better still;
There is a grace in Charlotte, in Eleanor a state
An elegance in Isabella, a haughtiness in Kate,
And Sarah is sedate and neat,
And Ellen innocent and sweet.
Matilda has a sickly name fit for a nurse's trade,
Sophia is effeminate, and Esther sage and staid;
Elizabeth's a matchless name, fit for a Queen to wear,
In castle, cottage, hut or hall, a name beyond compare,
Maria is too forward, and Gertrude is too gruff;
Yet coupled with a pretty face, is pretty name enough;
And Adelaide is fanciful, and Laura is too fine,
But Emily is beautiful, and Mary is divine.
Maud only suits a high-born dame,
And Fanny is a baby-name;
Eliza is not very choice, Jane is too blunt and bold,
And Martha somewhat sorrowful, and Lucy proud and cold;
Amelia is too light and gay, fit only for a flirt,
And Caroline is vain and shy, and Flora smart and pert;
Louisa is too soft and sleek,
And Alice gentle, chaste and meek;
And Harriet is confiding, and Clara grave and mild,
And Emma is affectionate, and Janet arch and wild
And Patience is expressive, and Grace is old and rare,
And Hannah warm and dutiful, and Margaret frank and fair;
And Faith, and Hope, and Charity,
Are heavenly names for sisters three.

Convolvulus; or, Morning Glory.

The Glory of Morn is a young spirit given,
In its beauty and freshness, to duty and heaven,
The Glory of Noon is a life of cross bearing;
A spirit, the marks of The Crucified wearing,
In the city where angels their anthems are singing.
And a forehead serene with its silver hair shining,
Holy Hope and firm Faith as the day is declining
And a vision of rest as from Pisgah's top given,
And a heart fixed on God is the Glory of Even.

How to obtain a long Lease of Life.

A curious medical work, by Richard Reese, of London, has lately made its appearance and is just attracting some attention, on account of the following article, which describes the uses and operations of the so called "Pommelling Hammer."

This simple instrument was invented by the late Admiral Henry, to pommel and rub parts of the body affected with rheumatism or subject to gouty inflammation, and for invigorating absorbent vessels in the cases of local deposits or diseased structure, in which it is desirable to bring the absorbents of the part into full action. By rubbing and occasionally pommelling different parts of the body which are subject to gouty and rheumatic attacks, Admiral Henry—who had for many years been a martyr to rheumatic gout—succeeded in not only curing it, but, by a perseverance in that practice after the malady was subdued, he succeeded in diminishing the sensibility or excitability of the nerves, and particularly of the membranes of joints, so as to render them unsusceptible of gouty or rheumatic action.

By persisting regularly in the use of this system, the Admiral fancied he could render the muscles and nerves of the body so firm and irritable as to prolong his life three hundred years. He pommelled and rubbed the abdomen with such a degree of force, as to act on the stomach and intestinal canal, and to its effects he attributed the regular state of his bowels, and the excellent condition of his digestive organs, having an excellent appetite, and being entirely free from any symptoms of indigestion; but, unfortunately for the anticipated results of this system, which has, unquestionably, considerable merit, the Admiral could not apply it to the most important organs of the body, namely, the brain, the lungs, and the heart.

The Admiral lived to the age of one hundred years, and for the last twenty-five years of his life was equal to considerable muscular exertions, often walking twenty-five miles in the course of the day without experiencing the slightest fatigue, and enjoying sound health. A similar mode of treating rheumatism and gout has lately been much recommended by Dr. Balfour, of Edinburgh, who has just published several cases in which it has completely succeeded. One great advantage arising from this system is, the cures it effects are generally permanent.

The Admiral being afflicted with cataract in both eyes, consulted Mr. Ware, who, finding them both ripe, advised him to have both extracted. He resolved to submit to the operation on the one eye only, promising that, if it succeeded, he should operate on the other.

The operation having completely failed, the Admiral determined to apply his system of pommelling and rubbing, the eye-lids being closed, to the other eye, which had the effect of bringing the absorbents into action, and the diseased lens was so completely removed, in the course of three months, that he had the power of reading small print.—Home Journal.

Improved Iron Bedstead.—The inventor, Mr. Forbes, has showed us a model of his bedstead, for which he has lately received a patent; and we must say it is one of the most ingenious and useful articles we have seen lately. The great convenience which it will afford to sick and infirm persons, will, we have no doubt, secure for it a large sale. A person occupying one of those bedsteads can readily raise himself to a sitting posture, and the bed is converted into an easy chair. It has this further recommendation, that the back can be placed at any angle the patient desires. Another recommendation which Mr. F.'s invention possesses, is, that by means of wheels arranged on the upper part of the bed frame, the patient can be raised off the bed altogether; as in the case of a broken limb, or any other infirmity, which requires a patient to remain in one position. This will be found to be a great recommendation. The machinery is all out of sight—nothing repulsive or suggestive of infirmity or disease meets the eye on looking superficially at this bedstead, and the casual observer would fail to recognize any material difference between it and those now in use. Everything is arranged with the precision of clockwork. We are glad that Mr. F. has obtained a patent.—The invention is a noble one, and worthy of it.

Quick Trip.—The steamer Keystone State, Capt. Hardie, arrived here at a quarter past eight o'clock last evening, in fifty-two hours from Savannah, being the quickest time on record.—Phil. Eve. Register.

News from St. Helena.—Appearance of a Russian Vessel at that Place.—We are indebted to G. W. Kimball, Esq., at St. Helena, for a copy of the Herald of May 18, forwarded by an arrival at New London, Conn. The Russian ship Cezerevitch, 527 tons, with 10 guns and 70 men, anchored in the roads off St. Helena, May 16. The arrival occasioned considerable speculation, indeed the Herald says:—If seventy Russian bears had been brought to the island, the event would hardly have produced more sensation. Some of the islanders were of opinion that the vessel ought to be detained and searched, while others would have made a prize of her at once, and taken all risks. The vessel proved to be in the employ of the Russian American Company, and the men chiefly landsmen, on their return home, having fulfilled the period of their engagement in the foreign service. Of course she was suffered to go without molestation. A slaver bark, name and nation unknown, was brought into St. Helena, on the 14th May, captured by H. B. M. sloop Linnet, off Kalemba, on the 30th April, supposed to be intended for the slave trade. A rumor is said to have been brought by her, that a vessel full of negroes had got clear a few days before. The St. Helena whaling ground during the present season, had been explored with success by the American whalers. During the last few weeks no less than eight sperm whales have been taken on the Carroll ground, yielding about fifty-five barrels.—New Bedford Mercury.

A Whale Captured off Nantucket Bar.—The schooner Wm. P. Doliver, Capt. McGuire, which returned a few days ago from a very successful whaling cruise of two months, sailed again yesterday, on a similar expedition, among the shoals around the island. The vessel had proceeded but about two miles from the Bar, and was lying "off and on," waiting for a boat to come off having the captain on board, when a large fin-backed whale was discovered near by, lazily moving along, apparently unmindful of the dangers that threatened. His seeming reverie was soon disturbed, however, by the entrance of a bomb lance into his huge side from the vessels deck, which immediately turned the current of his thoughts in another direction, and caused him to "turn up" in a very few minutes. He sunk in seventeen fathoms of water, but by the aid of grappels was raised again to the surface, and in the evening was towed into the harbor by the steamer Massachusetts.

This morning the whale was hauled up to the wharf to afford an opportunity to those who wished to view a specimen of the wonders of the mighty deep. His length is about sixty feet, but he will not, probably, yield over twenty or thirty barrels of oil, the blubber being very thin. It was a novel and interesting sight to most of our citizens.—New Bedford Standard.

"Tall Walking."—The Paris correspondent of the New York Times, describes two remarkable experiments in aerostation, which he gives assurance, were actually performed. A man enveloped in a net work containing a large number of bladders filled with hydrogen gas, ran, one day, down the Champs Elysees at the rate of thirty-five miles an hour. His leaps were enormous; the ascensional power of the gas was not sufficient to carry him up, but it neutralized three quarters of his weight. He subsequently renewed the experiment with a little more gas. He made forty miles an hour, and said, with a favorable wind he could easily make forty-five miles an hour, and beat any locomotive without fatigue. The Times correspondent adds:—

"With tremendous muscular power possessed by man, it is evident that if he could in any way lengthen his legs as this invention in reality does, he would realize the fable of Seven League Boots. Caulder the most agile clown of the circus, who was present agreed soon, with similar appuratus, to jump over the Seine. I understand that a dozen machines with improvements are now in course of fabrication, and that the idea of annihilating space has seized upon more than one adventurous brain. As to the æronauts they all acknowledge that they might as well burn their baloons."

A Hint to Niagara Visitors.—Our readers who intend to visit the Niagara Falls, will thank us for the hint, never to engage a vehicle to cross the bridge. The best plan is to cross the ferry for a shilling, select one of the conveyances always in waiting, which belong to colored men (the only reasonable persons there), order your route to terminate at the bridge, then walk over, and hack and omnibus will do the rest; or first drive to the bridge, dismiss your carriage, walk over, and take a hack on the opposite side;—otherwise you must pay in addition to 25 cents toll for each person, $1,50c for carriage toll! We know a gentleman, who, with his lady hired a hack at Niagara for $4, to convey them across the suspension bridge and up to Chippewa to join the steamer, but what with tolls; &c., it cost them NINE dollars!—Alb. Atlas.

☞ Many of the most influential presses of Massachusetts, and among them the Boston Atlas, are calling loudly for some new and stringent Legislation in regard to the Fugitive Slave Law, such that any man who shall act as commissioner, marshal, deputy, or otherwise, under that law, shall be forever disqualified for holding any office in the State; and the same law, it is contended, should apply to any man who acts as legal counsel for the slave hunter.—Elmira Rep.

Mr. Emerson, in one of his lectures, tells a story to exemplify the stability of things in England. He says that William of Wykeham, about the year 1150, endowed a house in the neighborhood of Winchester, to provide a measure of beer and a sufficiency of bread to every one who asked it for ever; and when Mr. Emerson was in England, he was curious to test this good man's credit and knocked at the door, preferred his request, and received his measure of beer and his quantum of bread, though its donor had been dead 700 years.

"Punch" on Bonnets.—The last number of Punch contains a pictorial guess at the distance at which ladies' bonnets will be worn from their heads at the next remove. The tendency has been further and still further rearward and the next change, Punch thinks, will carry them off the head entirely; so he represents the next fashion by two young ladies in full dress, and bare headed, sailling along the street, with a footman walking some ten feet behind, carrying the bonnet on a waiter.

Our Tour.

Dear Freeman,—After a hurried and rapid journey by steamboat, railroad and waggon, without being able to stop at Hamilton, I find myself in the flourishing settlement called Dawn, on the Sydenham, enjoying the hospitality alternately of those staunch friends of our paper, Messrs. Hill, Cary and Johnson, and the active assistance of this respectable body of people generally. The appearance of the country is beautiful just now, and industry and progress mark every foot-print made by our people, as well as those of their white neighbors. In the village of Dresden, carpenters are busy completing the fine buildings owned by Wm. Whipper, Esq.; smiths, waggon-makers, all are at work, and, to crown all, the farmers of the surrounding country have "demonstrated the problem" in connexion with the rest, whether the whites and colored people can live together on terms of equality, and as independent freemen; it has not to be proven here. Preparations are being made to celebrate the 1st of August at this place by a dinner. Mr. John Scoble is also expected to divulge a great secret on the August occasion, connected with the "future" of Dawn Institute; and as they have been told by him that they will not be asked to approve the scheme, but only to "carry it out;" and as the antecedents of this same Institute (three hundred acres of land without school or house for a school, except the building in which the government school is now held) have been of a complicated, and, at times, rather turbulent character; anxiety, expectation, doubt and uneasiness mark the features and conversation of the people. Frederick Douglass, Esq., and some great guns are to come from the States, I am told, whose policy, so recently "changed," will be told by themselves. Fears have been expressed to your humble servant as to the possibility of a coalition of the Dawn Institute and the "Colored Industrial School of the United States;" the attempt at which I could as easily believe as I could that the work for either will be anything but talk, so far as the people are to be benefited, for some time; or that the plan, which, by the way, has been found too good to keep until the 1st, will be any other than a grand scheme by which poor gentlemen, as well as rich ones, may line their pockets. The purpose is, as told by Mr. Scoble, to a gentleman here, to beg some thousands, with which to construct the building, &c., which, as a convention of the people—a mass gathering, first established the organization of Dawn, the people of Canada may well fear an attempt to commit them in a mass capacity,—to this new wholesale begging scheme, which there is no reason to doubt, either from those in America to be connected with it, nor from the plan itself, will furnish another pension-department for its begging agents, at five hundred or a thousand the year, as does another "institution" in this country. However, the people are wide awake. There is a certainty that the people of Dawn are helping themselves, whether their "friends" help them, or only revive old feuds amongst them, when pretending to be doing something; and they, with Canadians generally, will yet arise in their might and sweep these pretenders from amongst them. The Freeman is read here, and the people pay for it. They are satisfied, and the Provincial Anti-Slavery Union meets in connexion with it,—with the same approval here as at Toronto, London, Dundas, St. Catherines, and other places. Our travelling agents had generally been so charry of their efforts, that I had thought they could not do anything; but I find the people's hearts beat in the right place towards it, and Mr. Ward may look for the biggest turn out and warmest reception on his visit to these parts, that he or any other man ever had.

To-day has been quite a day for Dresden, the new Reform Candidate for Kent, Archibald McKellar, Esq., of Chatham, has been among the electors, asking their support at the future election. He will get a hearty support—as he should. Mr. McK. has always stood by the colored people of this county; when the Larwill party would have drummed Mr. King and Elgin out of Canada, Mr. McKellar was on hand to aid the right; and Reformers and not Reformers should consider his claims. Our people will do him justice, I think; they are wise enough to see the propriety of helping those, who, at a time when it was needed, helped them. The demonstration of to-day has been a glorious refutation of the charge of ingratitude against the colored people, forever on the lips of those who cannot get enough from them.

But a word more about my immediate visit. I am getting names and the "tin" for the paper, and only regret that your demands make such a short stay at present, imperative. The women—God bless them—see the work of reform to be theirs too, and good sisters in the places I have mentioned, will go to work for an Annual Bazaar to be held alternately at Toronto, London, Hamilton, Chatham, and other large places, as well as for a series of Tea-meetings this autumn, all in aid of their paper. But I must close for a meeting. The colored emigration is increasing, and no fear of "disastrous results."

Saturday, July 15.

I did not send to you the first part of this "missive," so a word more. The claims of the Freeman were presented last evening before a respectable gathering of the people, and with no apparent marks of disapprobation from any portion of the coloured people. True to instinct, however, Mr. John Scoble took occasion to impress upon the people that they could not "afford to lose any of their friends," (?) and as the inference was they were likely to do so, should the Freeman be continued; the spirit of the paper was such, that it should be stopped.

Such a barefaced attack, I dare affirm, was never made by mortal enemy against any paper, as this same pretended friend of coloured people, made upon the paper last night—every device that a wicked heart could suggest, was used to prejudice the minds of the people. "It would be an experiment," this editing by Mr. Ward. The paper was edited by persons of no position, and comparatively unknown,—its spirit was bad; and, when it was shown that Rev. Mr. Ward had a superior position to the gentleman talking, and that he had edited two papers before, your humble agent was suddenly the insignificant body Imposing scene! Mr. John Scoble, the would-be member for Peel, or anywhere, if you please, trying to do battle against a negro woman, in a log schoolhouse at Dawn! Conflict of Russian and Turk, how comparable with it!

But the people were uninfluenced: the conflict was so terrible and so little: the attack so unprovoked, that even an Indian present was compelled to speak out, which he did by an illustration too good to be lost, and with which I must favour you in my next.

Saturday evening a fine meeting was held in the Chatham Settlement, known as Peter B. Smith's. Of the success there, I will tell you next week. For the present, the Provincial Union will be a bond of agreement among good people, without respect to creed or origin, stronger than bands of iron.

Your obedient servant,

M. A. Shadd.

George Harris.

One of the most manly specimens of oppressed human nature, in "Uncle Tom's Cabin," is George Harris. The manner in which Mrs. Stowe disposes of him, and the words she puts into his mouth, as reasons for his going to Liberia, always struck us as a piece of needless and hurtful encouragement of the vile spirit of Yankee Colonizationism.

We never could reconcile it with an anti-slavery tale, nor see its place in an anti-slavery book. We well recollect, that some of the most prominent of the coloured men of New York complained of it at the time, very justly. Mr. Lewis Tappan, then came out with the statement, that Mrs. Stowe regretted that any evil influence should be wrought by that chapter, and that she was not a Colonizationist. But Mrs. Stowe, who is as capable of speaking her own thoughts, expressing her own opinions, and stating her own principles, as any woman on either side of the Atlantic, has not, we are grieved to say, thought proper, to disclaim Colonizationism, or to deprecate the negro-hating, negro-persecuting inference which Colonizationists might very fairly draw from that unfortunate chapter. This is the more to be regretted when we consider that Mrs Stowe, so well knows the difference between Colonizationism in America, and in England. In the latter country, it is friendship for the negro; in the former, the deadliest, most satanic enmity. Whatever, therefore, aids, encourages, or, in the least degree, forwards the former, is just so much practical help given to one of the worst class of Anglo-Saxon enemies and revilers it was ever the hard lot of the negro to contend with.

However, we hoped that bad chapter would be overlooked,—that the good the the book would do, would, by far overbalance the evil of that deplorable chapter. At least, thought we, if Colonizationists do not notice it, it is no business of ours, to cry to them, "Look here!" But with their accustomed keenness of vision, they have noticed and called particular attention to this chapter, and this hero, George Harris. We publish, this week, a paper from the January No. of the Colonization Herald, which shows how keen a blade Mrs. Stowe has put into the hands of our unscrupulous foes.—What a pity it is, that British America, either North, Temperate, or Tropical, could not have obtained the manly runaway mulatto, and his family!

Uncle Tom must be killed,—George Harris exiled! Heaven for dead negroes!—Liberia for living mulattoes! Neither can live on the American Continent! Death or banishment is our doom, say the Slaveocrats, the Colonizationists, and,—save the mark,—Mrs. Stowe!!

Let black men learn from this, and ten thousand like cases, the great lesson that the vindicaion of their rights and liberties, must be done mainly by themselves. That however gatefully accepting the assistance of friends, so far as it goes, the work, under God, is their own.

"Who would be free, himself must strike the blow."

A single remark more. Mr. Frederick Douglass was the chief orator at the anniversary of the conservatives, and spoke also at the other meeting. But, strangely enough—with talent and power that would make him facileprinceps in Liberia, and forced to deplore the prejudice of caste and colour in this county, making him feel every day and every hour his inferiority to the whites, and to see the impassable gulf that yawns between the two races—he pronounces colonization in Africa a nefarious and abominable scheme, and valiantly declares his unalterable resolution to live and die among the people who elbow him off the side-walk, and refuse to ride in the same car, or take their meals with him at the same table. This seems infatuation, but we will not quarrel with his taste. The sentiment of one of Milton's personages—better to reign in Tophet than to serve somewhere else—does not appear to be responded to very cordially by Mr. Douglass.

His inconsistency on another point, however, is somewhat amusing. When showing his audience at the Tabernacle that the world is really enlisted in the anti-slavery work, and has not been lulled to sleep by the clanking of chains, he triumphantly asked, "What is the world doing now?" "Reading Uncle Tom's Cabin; and when they have read that they will read the Key to the said Cabin!" "Very true," an auditor might have responded, "Mr. Douglass; but that book of your idolatory, the mere reading of which—as you very erroneously infer—proves that the world is more warmly enlisted than ever in the cause you are advocating, contains one of the strongest and best-put arguments for the colonization of yourself and the people of your race on the shores of Liberia that the world has heard for many a day. You might very well stand, Mr Douglass, for Mrs. Stowe's George Harris: your complexion is alike, your intelligence is similar, your sense of wrong, and your mode of expressing it are sufficiently akin; but George Harris favours colonization, which you denounce as a 'nefarious scheme,' and determines to go thither, while you determine to stay here; and fortifies his determination by reasons and arguments which you, Mr. Douglass, and none of your co-labourers can refute or answer."

In fact, Mrs Stowe's colonization argument is a burr under the bare feet of her abolition "lovers," a thorn in their side, a beam in their eye, as "vinegar upon nitre" to their delicate taste. She located him in Liberia, not because she believes in colonization, but because she could'nt locate him anywhere ese." This is your solution, Professor Stowe and Mr. Bacon is it? Could she not locate him in Canada, amid its not quite everlasting snows, if the States failed to give him an asylum? Could she not locate him among the legal subjects of Faustin Soulouque, under the shade of trees and beneath the influence of a sky whispering to him perpetually of Africa, the magnificent country from which his fathers were torn? Could she not have located him in England or Scotland, sending him on as an avant courier to prepare the way for her own triumphal entry there, to receive the felicitations of a country which would be sure to extend to one of her favorite proteges out of regard to herself at least, an enduring asylum and a welcome hospitality?

This matter about locating him in Liberia through necessity is simply preposterous, and the wretched shift resorted to shows how hard they who use it are driven for an argument. We take a more direct and manly view of the question, and do Mrs. Stowe the credit to believe that she located Harris in Liberia, just because she was persuaded that Liberia was the best place where he could be located; the place where galling inequality would disappear, where his talents and his piety could be more hopefully and fruitfully exerted, and where the greatest amount of happiness to himself, and means of doing good to others, could be certainly obtained. And while we sympathize with both abolition societies in their cruel disappointment at not finding in Mrs. Stowe an ally, ready to go the whole length of their revolutionary ultraism, we find consolation in the thought that she has made herself no party to the fierce anathemas which those who claim her as their own are wont to deal out unsparingly on one of the noblest schemes of modern philanthropy, the pages of whose history display the finger of God, brightly as the gilded spire the rays of the noonday sun. And while her graphic and powerful story has roused the sympathy of the world's heart in behalf of the oppressed, and indignation toward the oppressor, it has none the less pointed the world's eye to that infant republic, Heaven-shielded and fostered, a bright spot on the face of a continent lying in darkness, and shown the crushed descendant of Ham, when the yoke has been broken from off his neck, where he may find, with God's blessing, a safe and peaceful asylum, a congenial climate, a glorious country, a kindred people, a blessed religion, exemption from the "proud man's contumely," and a happy home, unless idleness, unthrift, and profligacy, with other vices which germinates as well from the corrupt heart of the African, on his own soil, as from that of his pale-faced brother everywhere, conspire to prevent it. C. V. S.

The following is an account of the Fast-Day Meeting at Norwich, May 26th:

From the Norfolk Herald.

Prince's Street Chapel (Independent.)

A meeting for prayer was held in Prince's Street Chapel in the morning, at half-past ten o'clock. After reading appropriate passages of Scripture, an address on the subjects which were suitable for prayer on such an occasion, was delivered by the Rev. John Alexander. Three members of the church, together with the pastor, opened up prayer, and a deep solemnity pervaded the congregation, who completely filled the lower part of the spacious building.

In the evening, at seven o'clock, a united meeting of persons belonging to Baptist and Independent congregations was held in the same place, which was crowded in every part. After singing, and reading the Scriptures, an address was delivered by the Rev. J. Alexander, which was chiefly founded on David's prayer in the sixty-eighth Psalm,—

"Scatter thou the people that delight in war."

After remarking that David was "a man of war from his youth," the speaker showed that David connected his wars with prayer, and that he undertook them with devout dependence upon God, whom he acknowledged as fighting with him and for him, and to whom he appealed to defend the right. But, though he practised war, he did not delight in it. Both he and the class to which he was opposed engaged in war; one from choice, the other from necessity; one for purposes of ambition, aggrandisement, and tyranny, the other from the love of justice, liberty, and truth; one delighting in it as a gratification of depraved passion, and the other deprecating it, as one of the direst calamities. These remarks were then applied to the war in which we are now engaged, and which was undertaken for the safety and liberty of others, rather than for selfish purposes; which was not entered into till after the government of our country had done their utmost to prevent it; and which was not an aggressive but a defensive war, to protect the weak against the strong, and the interests of civil and religious liberty against its determined and tyrannical foes. Various means had also been adopted to mitigate its evils; provision had been made for the wives and children of the soldiers; and government had permitted and encouraged the supply of Bibles and religious tracts to all our brave defenders. These circumstances showed that, though we had determined upon war, we had no delight in war, and that therefore we could consistently, and, he trusted, devoutly commit our cause to the providence and power of God. The address was concluded by showing the suitableness and importance of thus uniting together for humiliation and prayer, and for the full and frank confession of our individual and national transgressions, several of which were described and condemned. We should fervently pray that God would mercifully overrule the war for the frustration of ambitious projects, and for the extension of liberty and religion. We should also pray for our beloved and honored Queen, who, as chief magistrate, was one of "the powers ordained of God," and entrusted by him, not only with the sceptre of authority and rule, but with "the sword" of justice and punishment, which she was required "not to bear in vain." The awful responsibility of such a position as hers demanded the sympathies and prayers of every loyal and Christian man. We should also devoutly and earnestly desire that the God of mercy should bring the war to a speedy termination, and "make the wrath of man to praise him," by rendering it productive of liberty and happiness to mankind. And as many of the noblest religious institutions in our country arose amidst the tempests of the revolutionary war, let us promptly and zealously avail ourselves of the opportunities which this war may afford, to spread the gospel in Europe and the the world, and the happy time may come when "men shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks, and learn the art of war no more."

After prayer and praise, the second address was delivered by the Rev. S. R. Ward, a gentleman of color, from Canada, who most appropriately and eloquently dwelt upon the great privileges which this country had long enjoyed, and the great progress which it had made in knowledge, and liberty, and influence, far beyond that of any other nation. These very privileges had, however, exposed us to corresponding temptations to pride and vain glory, so that we needed to humble ourselves before God, and to seek his favor and protection by penitence and prayer. It was, however, a matter for much gratitude to God that this war had not been of our own seeking, and that it has been undertaken, not with selfish or ambitious intentions, but especially for the purpose of protecting Turkey against the grasping and destructive policy of the powerful and determined enemy of her liberties, and even of her existence as an empire.

This address evidently produced a deep impression on the crowded auditory, and after it was delivered, the Rev. Andrew Reed concluded the service with an earnest practical appeal to the people, beseeching them to cherish devoutly the feelings which had been excited in their minds; to exercise a generous confidence towards the government which had so reluctantly entered on the war; and to secure, by faith and prayer, an immediate interest in that great salvation which was brought to them by the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

Prayers were offered up by the Rev. Messrs. Howard, Scott, and Reed, and a collection was made for the wives and children of the soldiers, which amounted to about £17.

Trans-Atlantic Testimony.

The following resolutions were passed, unanimously, at a meeting of the Leeds (Eng.) Anti-Slavery Association, held May 30th, 1854:—

Moved by Wilson Armistead, Esq.; seconded by Rev. Wilsam Guest.

1. That we deeply and most sorrowfully lament, and feel imperatively called upon to utter our solemn protest, in the name of humanity, against the attempt now making, in the United States, to legalize slavery throughout an immense area of their territory where it has not yet existed, and thus open the way for a very large extension of an institution which has resulted in countless crimes and miseries wherever it has been tolerated—which is uniformly acknowledged to have acted as a blight and a curse in every land where it has existed, and which is a disgrace to the cause of Christianity in that country and throughout the world.

2. That whilst the iniquitous system of slavery has hitherto found some of its most zealous advocates amongst the professing ministers of the Gospel in the United States, we heartily sympathize with the protests against the extension of slave territory, which have been forwarded to the American Congress by thousands of the ministers of religion, as well as by vast numbers of laymen, who had hitherto taken no part in the efforts for the abolition of chattel slavery, and we would express an earnest hope that they will, henceforward, openly avow themselves in favour of the freedom of their unjustly enslaved fellow-creatures.

Mayor of Leeds, President.

A Hint to United States Visitors.

The Montreal Transcript, of a late date, contains the particulars of a case that came before the Courts of that city lately, which is of a rather interesting character.

It appears that a Kentuckian, named Ott, while on a visit to Montreal, thought that he might as well try to help a friend, and accordingly set about to devise means for enticing away from his master, Mr. Stephens, a colored man named Osborne, who had been for some time a resident in our free country. Osborne had been a horse-trainer, and in that capacity he had been very useful to his owner—a Mr. Campbell, in Baltimore—and strong inducements had been held out to him, at different times, to return to Kentucky. Ott's part in this affair is thus described:—

"On the 6th day of July, defendant being informed by Mr. Daly, that Osborne lived with Mr. Stephens, drove up to Mr. Romeo Stephens' house, and sent the cabman into his house by the back way, to enquire whether a black servant, named Osborne, lived there. He was shown to R. Stephens' father by a boy, when the cabman again got into the kitchen. Mr. Ott then held out inducements of higher wages and free papers, to get the boy to desert his master's employ, and offered to pay his passage to Kentucky. Being told by Osborne that he had $13½ a month, defendant told him he could get $60 or $70 per month, besides his gains by betting, and that he was a fool to stay a week for such wages, and that, if he would go with him, he would give him his free papers as soon as he got into the States. Defendant then a few times told Osborne not to mention the conversation to Mr. Stephens."

Proceedings were at once instituted against Ott; and notwithstanding the exertions of his lawyer, and of Mr. Daly, of the Donegana Hotel, who appears to have "shown the greatest desire to acquit the defendant," British justice took its course, and the Kentuckian, to his great mortification, was condemned to pay a penalty of 20s., with costs, and imprisonment for five minutes. This was certainly too lenient a punishment; but it will teach slaveholders that they cannot be allowed to tamper with colored men in Canada.

A Supposed Outbreak.—The Natchitoches, La., Chronicle, of the 24th ult., says:—For the last three weeks, there has been an increasing excitement among the planters and citizens in the neighborhood of Campte and Grapp's Bluff, arising from rumored reports of insubordination and outbreak among the slaves. There appear to be a conviction in the minds of the citizens that there is some truth in the reports, but, as yet, we cannot see anything positive to cause alarm. They have taken precautionary measures, appointed committee of vigilance, and organized active patrols. White men are implicated as the leaders of the blacks; but so far, no overt act, committed by them, has been discovered. Yesterday a large party of the citizens proceeded to the bank of the river where the State hands were at work, and arrested sixteen of them; they were conduct to Natchitoches, and placed in jail; there is as yet no charge made out against them; they are suspected of complicity in the contemplated outbreak. These negroes will probably be examined in a few days.

The Foreign News.

We give under our telegraphic head, such details of news by the Franklin as have reached us. The delightful uncertainty of news in general, and telegraphic news in particular, is well exemplified in the European intelligence of late. By last steamer, we were told that Russia had courteously consented to evacuate the Principalities out of regard for Austria. Now we are told she peremptorily refuses to evacuate them at all, and that she manifests a decided inclination to hold on to Moldavia at least. This may very possibly be only another phase of the game of duplicity that Russia and Austria are jointly playing on the Western Powers. It may be part of the programme that Austria shall make prodigious hostile demonstrations against Russia, but we venture the prediction that a small grave will hold all the Muscovite soldiers killed by Austrian bullets in the present war.

The Baltic fleet lay off Cronstadt at the last accounts, and was expected soon to make a general attack.

A revolution has been attempted, or effected, at Madrid,—with what result is somewhat uncertain.

Arrival of the Franklin.

INSURRECTION IN SPAIN!

ADMIRAL NAPIER BEFORE CRONSTADT.

BREADSTUFFS HIGHER.

New York, 18th July.

The Franklin left Cowes at half-past 6 p. m., on the 5th. She went ashore on Long Island Beach, off Moriches, early yesterday morning in a dense fog. The passengers all got ashore in safety, and arrived in this city at midnight, together with the mails.

The Pacific arrived at Liverpool at 4 a.m. on the 5th.

A military insurrection, headed by O'Donnell, has broke out in Spain. 4,000 of the Madrid Garrison had marched out towards Toledo.

The Queen had replied to the Austrian and Prussian summons, that she will resist to the last rouble.

The collision between the Austrian and Russian forces in Moldavia is imminent. The Russians had defended the Lireth, and the Austrian commander had gone to the seat of war with orders to insist on the evacuation of Moldavia, which the Russians refused.

Intelligence from Madrid to the 30th ult., states that the Town was much agitated. The insurgents, to the number of 4,000, were at the Campa del Mora, about a gun shot from the Palace.

General Campuzano, director of the artillery, had refused to attack them, although protesting his fidelity to the Queen. General Lara, had also refused, on the pretext that he could not rely on the garrison.

O'Donnell, it is said, has summoned the Queen to change her Ministry, and unless she did so, he would attack the town the same evening.

Subsequent advices to the 2nd inst., state that Madrid was covered with barricades. The populace are crying out death to Sartorionee.

The abdication of the Queen is under discussion, and the formation of the Regency of which Narvaez should be a member. On the other hand, the Patrie declares the news received from Spain to be favorable to the Government, and the insurgents, after having been defeated, marched to Toledo.

PARIS, July 4th.

The Moniteur contains a despatch from Bayonne of the 3rd instant, which states that on the 27th ult., the Queen of Spain appeared on the parade, and was well received by the troops and the populace.

A despatch from the Spanish Government of the 2nd states, that on the 1st, at 4 p.m., the Queen's troops attacked the insurgents and gained a signal advantage over them. The latter were routed, and many officers and privates have asked permission to return to their duty.

FROM THE BALTIC.

A despatch, dated Hamburgh, July 4th, states that on the 29th ult., the Anglo-French fleets were lying before Cronstadt, and that they expected a general attack the next day.

The bombardment of Boomersund began at 5 p.m., on 30th ult. The masked batteries were dismantled at 7 o'clock, and at 10, the Russian magazines were in a blaze. One account states the English loss at 3 men, and another four killed and seven wounded. The Russians fought desperately. A bomb fell on the deck of the Hector, and midshipman Lucas threw it overboard before it exploded.

Admiral Napier was near Cronstadt with 12 screw line of battle ships, a French ship of the line and seven steam corvettes.

LIVERPOOL, July 4th.

The latest report of the Liverpool Markets note American descriptions of Flour at an advance of 6d a 9d over the rates of Friday, at which a steady business was doing; stock much reduced, and the weather at the close of the week was quite stormy.

Wheat held at higher rates. Indian Corn in favor of buyers. Reports were current of a partial blight of the new potato crop.

Arrival of the Niagara.

HALIFAX, July 18.

The steamer Niagara, from Liverpool, Capt. Leitch, July 8th, arrived here at five o'clock this afternoon.

FROM THE BALTIC.

Sir Charles Napier was lying in line of battle before Cronstadt, but up to June 27th, no attack had been made. The English frigate Desperate had fired some shots, which the batteries had returned.

Boomensund was a second time bombarded on the 26th and 27th June, and the fortifications were destroyed.

FROM THE BLACK SEA.

On the 24th June, eight Russian steamers came out of Sebastopol and attacked three allied ships at the batteries. The allied ships engaged, were the Furious, Terrible, and Descartes. The affair seems to have been a running fight. The Furious was considerably damaged. The main body of the allied fleets were at Baljok.

Some English boats, taking soundings at the mouth of the Dnieper, exchanged shots with some Cossacks.

FROM THE DANUBE.

On the 21st and 22nd ultimo, an important battle was fought. The particulars are derived from a despatch from Beyrout. Omar Pacha fell on the rear of 25,000 troops, near Silistria, on the 21st, and the battle lasted nearly two days.

The Russians' loss is about 2,500 killed. They, however, made good their retreat.

The plans of the campaign, and the movement of the allied fleets are kept a profound secret.

A telegraph is being built to Varna Shumla, Widdin, and Gallipoli.

Fifty-thousand Anglo-French troops are still at Varna. St. Arnaud and Prince Napoleon are also there.

On the 22d the cannonade and attack on the Russians' rear-guard was heard, and General Canrobert sent 3 squadrons to reconnoitre.

Omar Pacha is preparing to establish his head-quarters at Rustchuk.

The communications with the Danube are kept open as far as Listova by the Turkish flotilla.

General Baraguay D'Hilliers commands the division of the French army embarking for the Baltic.

The English line-of-battle ships St. Vincent, Royal William, Algiers, Hannibal and Terrible, and steamer Lynx and others, are embarking a force at Cherbourg.

FROM ASIA.

The news from Asia is bad.

On the 19th June the Turks met with a severe check in attempting to storm two redoubts, between Ursenbeat and Kutais. The Russians attacked them on the flank during the assault and defeated them with the loss of 15,000 men, 13 cannon, 35 standards, and the entire camp equipments.

The crew of the English frigate Sansparei are fortifying Soukhoum Kaleh, and the crew of the English frigate Sampson, Kintriche.

An erroneous despatch was published, reversing the account, and stating that the Turks, under Salim Pacha, had defeated the Russians with the above loss, but reliable accounts shew that the Turks were disastrously defeated.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.

Breadstuffs.—Business in wheat and flour has been rather limited, without material change from our last quotations. The tendency of prices is downward. Corn rather active at 1s decline. Some circulars quote wheat 3d, and flour 6d lower.

Messrs. Richardson, and other leading houses, quote Western Canal Flour at 36s 6d; Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Canadian 37s. White Wheat 10s a 11s. White and Yellow Corn 35s.

(From the Bermuda Gazette of July 4.)

BARBADOES.

Fearful Mortality by Cholera.

We stated in our last, on the authority of Captain Smith, of the schooner Medora, that cholera had made its appearance at Barbadoes, and that the deaths had amounted to upward of 100 per day by that disease. Since then we have received files of St. Thomas papers to the 21st, and Barbadoes to the 14th ultimo, too fully confirming the melancholy tidings brought by Captain Smith, and proving further that the mortality had been on the increase, till the number of deaths by that fell disease, in the new (City) burial ground of Bridgetown, amounted in one day to the frightful number of 244 human beings! The total number of deaths in the city had reached, on the 13th, to 2,107. In the Garrison of St. Anne there had been 64 deaths.

In the suburbs of Bridgetown there had been 14 deaths.

Just beyond Black Rock, in a little village called Panes Bay, there had been 58 deaths.

Abel Clinket, Esq., the originator, proprietor, and (for 32 years) sole editor of The Barbadian, has died of the disease. Dr. Drinan, the editor of The Globe was "barely convalescent after an "attack of cholera, unsurpassed in severity by "anything of the kind that has ever been experienced." The sub-editor of The Liberal was down with the disease. A half sheet only of The Liberal was issued on the 14th. In alluding to the disease and the circumstance of the reduced size of his paper, the editor says: "Under these "circumstances, we know not how soon we may "be obliged to suspend our issue altogether. "There is but a single hand in our office besides the foreman."

Of the 150 prisoners confined in the jail, 13 survived, whence the Governor very humanely ordered their release.

Among the deaths there have been 70 white persons, the remainder colored.

The shipping at Barbadoes was healthy. A large vessel had left there for Demerara, but returned to post in a few days, the cholera having appeared on board and two or three deaths ensued.

EMIGRATION FROM LIVERPOOL.—The total number of emigrant ships which took their departure from Liverpool during the past month, for all foreign ports, was 55 ships, of an aggregate tonnage of 54,825 tons, and having on board a total number of 27,222 passengers. Of these, 36 ships were for the United States, with 18,405 emigrants, to whom the largest number of 10,722 were Irish, 4,752 foreigners (chiefly Germans), 2,529 English, and 399 Scotch. For Canada and New Brunswick (British America) the number of ships were seven, with 3,223 emigrants; and for the Australian colonies 14 ships, carrying 5,480 passengers, 108 being first cabin, and the remainder second and third class passengers. Of these, 2,450 were English, 1,550 were Irish, 1094 Scotch, and 288 natives of other countries, chiefly Germans and Swiss. The number of short ships, which do not come under the inspection of the government agents, was 55, having on board 2,357 passengers.

Cholera.

CHICAGO.—The Cleveland Ledger of the 13th has the following:

The Asiatic cholera is producing terrible consternation in Chicago. People are fleeing into the country by thousands, terror-stricken. Several of the most prominent merchants and business men of the city have been suddenly stricken down. The Board of Health report the total number of deaths during the month of June at 333, of which 147 were from cholera. From the 1st to the 8th inst., the interments reached 242, the majority of which were caused by cholera. The mortality is chiefly confined to the poorer classes. Business is in a great measure suspended. The cars arrive empty, and leave full of passengers going out of the city. The cool weather of the last few days has caused a decline in the mortality.

Fourteen cases of cholera were reported in Boston on the 12th, three of them fatal.

OREGON.—The Crescent City (Oregon,) Herald has the following:

We learn from a gentleman of undoubted veracity, that Mr. Curtis, of Whalesburg, O. T., has discovered a valuable quicksilver mine, three miles below Rogue River. It covers an area of some 15 or 20 acres, and is probably the largest and richest mine of its kind in the world. Mr. C. holds it by a pre-emption title.—Phil. Register.

IRISH AND AMERICAN RIOT IN MASSACHUSETTS.—Boston, July 10.—It is reported that a disturbance took place in Lawrence yesterday, between the Americans and Irish, in which pistols and other deadly weapons were freely used. Another report states that the Catholic church was destroyed, when the Irish raised the American flag, union down, with a cross over it. The Americans rallied and tore it down. Several persons were injured in the melee which followed.

The Cuban planters being determined to get cheap labor somewhere, are importing Chinese in lieu of negroes. Four hundred and seventy were landed in Havana, during one week in the beginning of this month.

MEZIM BEY, LATE LIEUT. TEVIS.—We find in a letter in the Journal of Commerce, dated Constantinople, June 1st, the following mention of Mr. Carroll Tevis, formerly of Philadelphia, now in the service of the Sultan: "Dispatches from the army of Antolia, state that the Russians had been defeated at Kars, and are retreating towards Erzeroum. Bin-Bashi, (lieutenant colonel) Mezim Bey, (late Lieutenant Tevis, of the American mounted rifles,) now in command of a thousand Bashi-Baizouks, is said to have distinguished himself in the action. The Turkish accounts speak in the highest terms of the American Bey."

☞ The Indianapolis State Sentinel says, that "the State Convention of Know Nothings, or United Americans," commenced its sittings in that city on the 11th. The Masonic Hall, it says, was engaged for the meeting, and all the windows were blinded.

☞ The Philadelphia North American says that grasshoppers in innumerable swarms infest the fields in many parts of Eastern Pennsylvania, carrying devastation to all the vegetation of the fields.

☞ The summit of the Green Mountains, east of Burlington, was white with snow on Monday morning of last week.

☞ The St. Louis Intelligencer says that in St. Charles county, a large portion of the wheat crop is likely to be lost for want of harvesting hands. As high as $3 per day is paid for labor.

GOOD.—The Columbus (Ohio) Journal of the 5th, says our farmers are now in the midst of a glorious harvest. Despite the croakers and the "little yellow weevil," we shall have an abundant wheat crop in this county. The corn crop promises well—the last two weeks has brought it out nobly.

☞ One man in Riverhead, L. I., raised 2000 quarts of strawberries this year.

Nomination of Candidates for Toronto.

THE Nomination of Candidates took place yesterday at the City Hall, when Messrs. Ridout, Sherwood, Bowes, Cameron, and Boulton were nominated

The show of hands was decidedly in favour of Mr. Bowes, but it would be difficult to say who was the second man according to this mode of expressing popular opinion.

The speeches were in no respect remarkable, and the proceedings passed off in a very sober manner. The election takes place on the 26th and 27th inst.—Citizen.

Incendiary Fire.

On Tuesday night and Friday morning, the house of John Hector, Esq., on William Street, was on fire three times. The family were absent from home, two female servants only remaining in the house. About half-past 10, p. m., on Tuesday, a large arm-chair in the drawing-room was discovered to be on fire; but, by the assistance of neighbours, the flames were extinguished, without much damage. On the succeeding morning, about eight o'clock, the sheds, woodpile and verandah, were found to be in flames—and the fire had gained so much headway, that it was feared the house would be destroyed. By the use of a small hand-engine, however belonging to Mr. Baines, which was being repaired at Mr. Richmond's shop on Queen Street, the fire was checked, without much damage being done, save to Mr. Hector's furniture, in removing it. Again, at three o'clock on the same day, fire was discovered in a cupboard on the second story, among some female clothing, in a place which it was impossible that fire could have accidentally reached. It was fortunately discovered soon, and extinguished. So many recurrences caused the greatest suspicion of incendiarism; and Mr. Gurnett, on being applied to, entered into an investigation of the circumstances yesterday, in the Police Court. The result was, that one of the female servants, named Elizabeth Buchanan, was remanded for further examination. —Colonist.

A WOMAN OVER THE FALLS.—A gentleman from Louisville, Ky., stopping at the Cataract, and while standing on the piazza in the rear overlooking the rapids, saw the body of a female floating down the races in the rear of that House on Monday last. He communicated the fact to one of the proprietors, who immediately repaired to Point View, but could discover nothing. On going up the race, a shawl was found near the bathing establishment of Mr. Tuscher, and identified by Mr. Russel, a resident of this village, as belonging to his wife. Her name, previous to marrying Mr. R., was Ann Hall, and was for some time in the employ of Mr. Jacobs. We learn that the women has for some time been subject to spells of aberration of mind, and that the fact was consumated while in that state.—Iris of Niagara.

HORRIBLE EFFECTS OF INTEMPERANCE.—On the 10th inst. at 11 o'clock p. m., the alarm of fire was sounded. On arrival at the place, we found it to be a frame house in St. Andrew Street, Bytown, that was on fire. The adjoining building being small, and not of much value. We were about to retire, but before doing so, shrieks were distinctly audible from the burning building. Alas! too late to save a child of about six years of age—the daughter of a man named St. Louis, the occupant of the burning building. By desperate efforts, the firemen secured her blackened and charred remains. Two adjoining buildings were also burnt—The most melancholy part remains to be told; the author of this calamity was the father of the burnt child, who is said to have deliberately set fire to the premises, and placing himself on the doorstep, refused his shrieking wife admission into the house to save the child. The scene was most heartrending; St. Louis is now in jail awaiting his trial. —Bytown Gazette.

"HER MAJESTY."—The Greenock (Scotland) Advertiser says, on the 9th of June an iron paddle steamer was launched from the building yard of Mr. Archbald Denny, Dumbarton. Her dimensions are as follows: Length, 195 feet, breadth, 19½ feet, depth, 9½ feet. She was named Her Majesty by Miss Sword, daughter of Archibald Sword, Esq., Greenock. Her Majesty is intended to ply on Lake Ontario, and will be steamed across the Atlantic as soon as possible. Thos. Dick, Esq., of Toronto, is the owner of this fine vessel. Her Majesty's engines are making by the celebrated firm of Robert Napier, of Glasgow. This splendid craft is a sister to the Peerless, now running between Toronto and Lewiston.

Great Sale of Lands for Arrears of Taxes.

We perceive by the Canada Gazette that a vast quantity of land is about to be sold in October next in the Counties of Lambton, Kent, Essex, and Carleton, for arrears of Taxes.

We do sincerely hope that hereafter there may be ample notice of all Sales of Crown Lands, that our friends at home may hear of and take advantage of the very great inducements which Canada holds out to bona fide Settlers. It is no longer to be endured that hole-and-corner Sales of Lands, at thirty days' notice, and announced in some obscure local journal, should take place.

Let all lands belonging to the Crown of England be hereafter offered to all British subjects in an honest straightforward way after adequate notice. Canada is rich enough to pay the cost of an advertisement in some of the leading Journals of the United Kingdom. Lands of first rate quality in Canada are to be purchased at less than one year's rent of property in some of the less-favoured counties of Great Britain, and it only wants due publicity to bring out British Capital and muscle and skill to cultivate the many MILLIONS of unoccupied acres in Canada belonging to the Crown of England! In this, the Upper Province, there are nearly ten millions of acres of lands unoccupied, whereof, as yet, "the mower filleth not his hand, neither he that bindeth up the sheaves his bosom."

The broad lands of Canada do not belong to speculators in or out of the present or any future Ministry. The subjects of Great Britain everywhere are entitled to compete for them.—Old Countryman.

The New York Daily Times of the 14th inst. asserts that it is stated, in private letters received from England by the Asia, that Lord ELGIN will return to England so soon as his recent treaty with the United States is completed, by the assent of all parties—that the British Ministry has not abandoned the intention of sending out his Royal Highness the Duke of CAMBRIDGE, as Viceroy of Canada and the rest of British America,—that the appointment will not be formally made until the Dukes return from the seat of war,—and that Sir EDMUND HEAD, now Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, will probably be his locum tenens, holding office until after the Duke's arrival. The Times adds that there is some difference of opinion as to the amount of salary to be paid to the proposed Viceroy. Some arguing for £12,000 and others in favour of $30,000 per annum.—Colonist.

The number of emigrants that arrived in Quebec from the opening of navigation to the 8th of July was 28,109, exceeding the number that arrived during a corresponding period last year by 10,131.

NOVELTIES IN EMIGRANT SHIPS.—The Kingston, leaving Southampton, has been fitted up with baths, and an oven for baking soft bread, with which the emigrants will be supplied twice a week.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of everything, having generally fled stealthily, and without making any preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GRIBBLE, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL RINGOLD WARD, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Loving and Forgiving.

Oh, loving and forgiving—
Living hearts on earth,
Ye are were not worth the living
If ye had not birth!
Oh, loving and forbearing—
How sweet your mission here;
The grief that ye are-sharing
Hath blessings in its tear.

Oh, stern and unforgiving—
Ye evil words of life,
That mock the joys of living
With never ending strife.
Oh, harsh and unrepenting
How would ye meet the grave,
I. Heaven, as unrelenting,
Forbore not, nor forgave?

Oh, loving and forgiving—
Sweet sisters of the soul,
In whose celestial living
The passions find control!
Still breathe your influence o'er us
Whene'er by passion crost,
And, angel-like, restore us
The paradise we lost.

Selections.

A Hint for Housekeepers.—A few drops of carbonate of ammonia in a small quantity of warm rain water, will prove a safe and easy anti-acid, &c., and will change, if carefully applied, discolored spots upon carpets, and indeed all spots, whether produced by acids or alkalies. If one has the misfortune to have a carpet injured by whitewash, this will immediately restore it.—Ohio Cultivator.

Lemon Pies.—A lady tells the Agriculturalist how to make lemon pies. Grate the peels of four lemons, and squeeze the juice into the grated peel. Then take nine eggs, leaving out half of the whites, one pound of loaf or white sugar, half a pound of butter, one pint of cream, or of milk, and four tablespoonfuls of rosewater, and beat them well together, and add the lemon. Divide into four pies with undercrust, and bake.

Wheat meal Pudding—Fine Flavored.—Beat five eggs, add to them four cups sweet milk, one cup sweet cream with salt. Into this stir a cup full of flour and wheat meal, sufficient to make a batter a little thicker than for griddle cakes. Boil one and a half hours. Serve in the same manner. The water should be boiling when the puddings are put in, and kept till they are done. It is necessary to turn them occasionally, as they will rise to the top.

Good Cement.—Take some common lime and mix it with a quantity of tar—just enough to make a tough dough. Use it quick because it becomes hard in a few moments, and will never soak or crumble. This is a first-rate cement for the purpose of making swine troughs, feed boxes, eave troughs and many other things.

Chimneys.—In building a chimney, it is recommended that a quantity of salt be put into the mortar with which the inner course of brick are to be laid, which will prevent the accumulation of soot, on account of the salt absorbing moisture from the atmosphere every damp day, and the soot also becoming damp through the means, falls down into the fire-place.

Cheap Paint.—For the outside of dwellings and out-houses, where economy and durability are considerations. Take a barrel and put in it a bushel of quicklime; slack the latter by pouring over it boiling water—covering the lime four inches deep, and stirring it till slacked: dissolve two pounds of sulphate of zinc (white vitriol) in water, which must be added to the whitewash.—This will harden the lime when it is applied to the wood, leaving a firm white crystalized surface. To make the wash a cream colour, add four pounds of yellow ochre; for a fawn four pounds of umber, and one pound lamblack; stone colour, one pound umber, and two pounds lamblack.

A Bold Stroke—We heard an anecdote from a gentleman who recently travelled by train from Bristol to London, which displays the quick-witted promptitude of some people. There was in the carriage with him a fellow passenger, a stranger to him, but who, while looking out of the window some time after the train passed Swindon, had his hat blown off. Without hesitating a moment or passing a second in perplexity, he took from the roof-straps over his head a new leathern hat-box, and threw it out of the window after the hat. All looked astonished at this appearance of foolish wilfulness, and our informant ventured to ask him if he thought that a wise act, because he had lost his hat, to throw out his hat-box also? "Certainly," replied the other, "my hat was a new hat, and if some workman or policeman picks it up, he will either put it on his greasy head or carry it to the next station in his hand, until, on a wet day like this, it is ruined. Now, when he sees the hat-box near it, he will have the sense to put it into it, and my name is in the hat box, so that I can have both sent up to London after me," and so saying he deliberately put on his travelling cap, and made himself quite easy on the point. Our informant, on returning from town, was quite curious enough to enquire at Swindon if these calculations were successful, and learnt it was just as he had anticipated. The hat and hat-box were found, and forwarded to London for the owner.—Bristol Times.

Marrying for Love.—The Staunton Vindicator states that a pair of determined lovers of Augusta county, left home a few days ago to have their "lives, their fortunes and their sacred honor," united in the "holy bands." Poor in everything but love and their pappas and mammas opposing their union, they started for a "free State," and walked arm-in-arm from Staunton to Winchester, a distance of ninety-six miles. Here they took the railroad cars for Harper's Ferry, a distance of twenty-six miles, to the end of their "lovely" journey. The remainder of the story we give in the words of the Vindicator, "When they landed at their destination, the dooring groom, after shoving his arm up to the elbows in his breeches pocket, found that he hadn't the dimes to "pay the piper." In this dilemma, like a cool spring in a parching desert, there appeared some generous philanthropic men to rescue the loving twain from that brink of woe on which they were verging. A "pony purse" was got up, sufficient to "do the deed," and strike a low of promise athwart the souls where the truest [illegible] a cloud of despair. The [illegible] was tied, the parson paid, and the happy pair, with joy and gladness radiating their countenances, started about their return journey. Truly, this was marrying for love."—Richmond Enquirer, July 11.

Novel Marriage.—The Fort Smith Herald records the following:—"The other day the sedate clerk of our court was surprised by a marriage, in his presence, of a couple who walked into his office. It was in this wise: He was sitting at his desk, busily engaged in writing, when a gentleman from the country, about 50 years of age, and a lady, not far behind in this respect, entered the office, and, after the usual salutations, the man asked him a few questions about the law on contracts, and wished to know what marriage was considered, legally. The clerk informed him that it was considered a civil contract, when the old gentleman pulled out a paper, read over a short agreement made by the parties before him to live together their natural lives, and to have and to hold, as the law goes, all things in common for their mutual benefit, asked the clerk to record it, paying over his fees, 50 cents, and both deliberately and quietly walked off, leaving the clerk in utter astonishment, and pretty well confounded by what he had never seen before—a marriage without parson, judge, or squire."—Journal & Express.

A Sensible Little Girl.—A little girl, after retiring to bed with her mother, said: "Ma, I want to pray;" whereupon her mother helped her out of bed, and she got upon her knees and prayed thus: "Oh God, I want my father to quit chewing tobacco for Christ's sake. Amen."

Awful!—One of our exchanges tells a story of a lazy genius up his way, who being asked, as he lay sunning himself on the grass, what was the height of his ambition, replied: "To marry a rich widow that's got a cough!"

Severe Retalliation.—A subscriber to the Token has stopped his paper, not that he has any objection to it, but because he has had a quarrel with the postmaster, and don't wish to patronise him by receiving a newspaper through his office.

The late Marquis of Anglesey.—Mr. Francis, one of the gentlemen of her Majesty's chapel, St. James's, tells the following characteristic anecdote of the late Marquis of Anglesey. Mr. Francis was entering the chapel from the lobby one Sunday morning, in his surplice, at the same time as the venerable marquis; and, on his drawing aside to allow the old warrior to pass him, the strict disciplinarian stopped and exclaimed—"No, Mr. Francis; you here take precedence of me. You are on duty—I am not. Go on."

Wives Wanted.—Marriageable girls are quick in the Minnesota market. We quote from a letter in the Boston Daily Advertiser:—"Several leading and wealthy citizens of Saint Paul have married Indian squaws—aboriginal ladies, perhaps, I ought to say. These matches are caused less by romance than by the necessity of having a wife and the scarcity of white women. When there is an importation of the latter commodity from the east, it is eagerly seized. I heard of a gentleman from our part of the country who came out to settle with his three daughters. In two weeks he was alone, but his family had increased by the addition of two sons-in-law.—Daily Registrer.

Good Authority.—An ostler being questioned in court as to the age of a certain mare, replied that he had it from the mare's own mouth.

A young man who had lost his hair by disease, inquired of Elder P., for a recipe to re-produce the crown of manhood "where the wool ought to grow." "Good Brandy," said the Elder, "is the best application I know of, and," added the jocose preacher, "when you have the hair well started on the outside, just take a little eau de vie internally, to clinch it."

An Irishman, who was once on a journey, said he never liked to see tables full of books and newspapers where he stopped, over night, "for," said he, "I can never find any whiskey at such places." A shrewd inference.

☞ A gentleman was promenading a fashionable street, with a bright little boy at his side, when the little fellow called out,

"O, Pa, there goes an editor!"

"Hush, son," said the father, "don't make sport of the poor man; God only knows what you may come to yet!"

"How is it," said a gentleman to Sheridan, "that your name has not an O attached to it? Your family is Irish, and no doubt illustrious." "No family has a better right to an O than our family," said Sheridan, "for we owe everybody."

Mrs. Jemima Jipson could never go to bed without first looking underneath to see if somebody was not stowed away there. But her search had always been bootless. At last, however, one night she spied, or thought she did, which is all the same, the long-looked-for boots and legs. "Oh! Mr. Jipson! Mr. Jipson! she screamed out, there is a man under the bed!" "Is there!" cooly drawled her husband; "well, my dear I am glad you have found him at last; you have been looking for him these last twenty years!"

There is a town in Maine called Random. A resident of the place being asked where he lived, said he lived at Random. He was taken up as a vagrant.

☞ Seeing a bouquet of flowers in one of the pigeon-holes of the Post Office yesterday, we ventured to ask the obliging clerk whether they came by mail. "No, sir, by female," was the prompt response.—Columbus (O.) Fact.

A teacher asked a bright little girl, "what country is opposite us on the globe?" "Don't know, sir," was the answer. "Well, now," pursued the teacher, "if I were to bore a hole through the earth, and you were to go in at this end, where would you come out?" "Out of the hole, sir!" replied the pupil.

Somebody has said that it is as hard to tell where moderate drinking ends and drunkenness begins, as it is to tell when a pig ceases to be a pig and becomes a hog.

Dogs.—The Sandusky (Ohio) Mirror gets off a good piece of dog-gerel in the shape of an acrostic on the Nebraska traitors of Ohio:

DOGGEREL—AN ACROSTIC.

Disney, Olds, Green, Shannon—Dogs.

D–id any body ever see in all his travels,
O–r did any body ever hear of such a pack of devils?
G–o proclaim it to the world—let it ring upon the wind,
S–uch men would sell our freedom—the birthright of mankind.

How to Walk.—In walking, always turn your toes out and your thoughts inward. The former will prevent you from falling into cellars, the latter from falling into iniquity.

"The following pertinent question," says an exchange, "was recently addressed to a lawyer of our acquaintance at a fair in a neighboring village:—'If distance lends enchantment to the view, and view refuses to return it, can distance recover any legal redress?'"

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state.

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

Frederick Douglass,
John D. Peck,
Amos G. Beman,
John Jones,
J. D. Bonner,
J. McCune Smith,
} Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "The American Industrial School."

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the school.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Aliened American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

Its Objects.

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

General Objects:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and Social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

Supporters:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

Origin and Progress:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the Gospel Tribune his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Lately, his position as Publisher of the Scripture Manual, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

Co-Laborers.

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the Tribune's Mission.

Terms and Notices:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post paid, and Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, Robert Dick, Box 411, Toronto.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the Tribune's object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties

(Signed) Robert Dick.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

Men and Brethren:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long sought end, to do away with the dehumanizing effects of the present proscriptive accessories of the rising generation of colored people in this country. To go on, we must or [illegible] a position of entire equality, of interests, of rights, composing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the ruling element of society in which we live. The policy necessary to the [illegible] must be in our favor, if ever we exercise the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights and privileges which belong to us. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring certificates properly authenticated, or bring satisfactory assurance to the Committee on Credentials [illegible] as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. If not, then, there is no part of the wide-spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in these climes, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, of [illegible] satisfied with its [illegible] race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all railroads—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised that no favors will be shown to a scheme of their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R. Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must [illegible] a [illegible], create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of but few things glorious to carry out.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a trade fraud as it is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will sell such a poison and himself so vile and treacherous a trade for the gain of a few cents a sixpence, is unsafe to deal with and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

The following are our only Agents in Hamilton, C. W. T. BICKLE & SON; HAMILTON, KNEESHAW & CO., In Toronto, LYMAN BROTHERS, & CO., are our general agents—we also sell to SIMPSON & CO.

The Tempest on Galilee.

BY J. W. BARKER.

"And behold, as they sailed, he fell asleep, and there came down a great storm of wind on the lake."

'Tis midnight on the calm still sea,
Thy bright expanse, O Galilee,
No breath disturbs thy glittering sheen,
Reflecting many a starry gleam.

The pale-eyed moon lies tremblingly
Upon the bosom of the sea,
Whispering perchance some words of fear,
Which none but fairy ears may hear.

Just dropped upon the noiseless wave,
Lightly it spreads its watery way,
That gallant bark that by the shore,
Lay moored throughout the live-long day.

Its white arms catch the stirring breeze,
And setteth for the other shore,
And like a "fairy thing of life,"
With noiseless step it glideth o'er.

E'en now, around the skirting sky,
The green hills meet the sailor's eye,
All calm and beautiful as when
The earth first blessed the sight of men.
The weary crew now sank to sleep,
Glide o'er the bosom of the deep.

Oft in the ear of many a dream,
Some silver tongued syren sings,
While all around the calm still air,
Is stirred by dismal whisperings.

Far away o'er the distant mountain's brow
The fierce storm spirit waketh,
And swift on the folds of the thunder cloud
Its fearful murmurs breaketh.

Down pours the storm in livid streaks,
The lightnings shoot athwart the sky,
Like maddened demons from their chains,
The waves in swift succession fly.
Upright they leap with streaming eyes
They gaze upon the fearful scene,
And thro' the darkness of the night,
No ray of hope—no light is seen.

Death stands before them—and the light
Of faith seems dimly burning;
They who had sat at Jesus' feet,
They who had witnessed many a feat
Of power Divine, seem basely turning
Away from that Almighty power,
And madly curse this fearful hour.

One hammock has not been disturbed,
One sleeper still in quiet rests,
Nor storm, nor tempest can unfurl
The quiet of his tranquil breast.
Now feeble faith at length is heard,
Above the clamor of the waves,—
"Dost thou not care that we are lost,
And perish in our watery graves?"

He rises with majestic awe,
And chides them for their foolish fear,—
"Did ye not know my power to save,
When danger standeth very near?
O feeble faith! Could ye suppose,
While I was with you, wind or storm,
Had power to drown your floating bark
Or do my children any harm?"

That melting gaze, thrown o'er the sea,
Now mounting to the stormy sky,
The waves stand still, and own their Lord,
And quail before his piercing eye.
He lifts his mighty, conquering arm,
Above the waters, fierce and wild,
He grasps the tempest in his fist,—
The winds and waves are reconciled.

"Peace"—through the mighty depths that voice
Resoundeth, and along the shore,
The billows kneeling quietly,
In silent worship there adore.
Thus Thou canst still the fiercest storm,
That rageth in the human breast,
Canst bid the waves of sorrow cease
And still the troubled heart to rest.

Miscellaneous.

What came of an Omnibus Ride,

"AND ONE PULL TO THE RIGHT."

Some time ago (no matter when; little folks shouldn't be curious!) I was riding in an omnibus with some half dozen well-dressed ladies, and white-kidded gentlemen.

At a signal from somebody on the sidewalk, the driver reined up his horses, and a very old man, with tremulous limbs and silvery locks presented himself for admission. The driver shouted through the sky-light, 'Room for one more, there, inside;'—but the gentlemen looked at the old man and frowned, and the ladies spread out their ruffled skirts, for his hat was shabby, and his coat very threadbare. He saw how it was, and how there was 'no room,' and meekly turned about to go down the steps, when a fine-looking young man, who sat next to me, sprang to the door, and seizing him by the arm, said, 'Take my place, sir; you are quite welcome to it, I am young and hearty; it won't tire me to walk,—and kindly leading the old man to the vacant seat, he leaped from the steps and walked briskly down the street, while I looked admiring after him, saying to myself, 'That young man has had a good mother.'

We drove on, and the more I looked at the old man's silvery hairs, and fine, honest face, the more indignant I felt at the way he had been treated. Whether he read my thoughts in my countenance or not, I can't say; but after most of the passengers had got out, he moved up to me and said, 'Good boy—good boy—wasn't he? My dear, (and here his voice sunk to a confidential whisper,) I have got money enough to buy out all the upstart people that filled this omnibus, twenty times over, but I like this old coat and hat. They are as good as a crucible. Help me to find out the true metal. Good morning, my dear. Thank you for your pity, just as much as if I needed it,' and the old man pulled the strap, got out of the omnibus, and hobbled off down street.

Some time after, I advertised for lodgings, and was answered by a widow lady. I liked the air of the house, it was so neat and quiet; and then, the flowering plants in the window were a letter of recommendation to me. Your cold-hearted, icicle people never care for flowers. But what particularly pleased me, at Mrs. Harris's, was the devotion of her son to his mother. I expected no less, because the minute he opened the door, I saw that he was the young man who gave up his seat in the omnibus to the gentleman.

John did all the marketing and provided as wisely and as well as if he were seventy, instead of seventeen. He wheeled his mother's arm chair to the pleasanter corner; handed her footstool, and newspaper and spectacles; offered her his arm up stairs and down, and spent his evenings by her side, instead of joining other young men in racing over the city to kill time.

It was a beautiful sight in these days, when beardless boys came stamping and whistling into their mother's presence, with their hats on, and calling her 'the old woman.'

I spent a pleasant autumn under Mrs. Harris's quiet roof. And now winter had set in, with its nice long evenings. John came in to tea, one night, with his bright face over-clouded. His mother was at his side in an instant. John's master had failed, and John was thrown out of employment!

Then I learned, that it was only by the strictest economy, and hoarding of every cent of John's small salary, that the house rent was paid, and the table provided.

'And now,' so the widow said, 'the house must be given up, for John might be a long while getting another place; clerkships were so difficult to obtain; and they must not think of running into debt.'

It is such a pity. We were all so comfortable and happy there, in the cozy little parlour, with its sunny bow-window full of flowers, and its bright Lehigh fire, and softly-cushioned chairs; that cozy parlour, where the little round table, with its snowy cloth, had been so often spread; and the fragrant coffee, the delicate tea-biscuit, and racy newspaper had been so often discussed; where John, in his slippers and dressing-gown, with his dark hair pushed off his broad forehead, read to us page after page of some favorite author, while the wind was welcome to whistle itself dumb outside the threshold, and old Winter to pile up the snow at the door till he got tired of it.

It was hard!

John walked up and down the floor, with his hands crossed behind him, while Mrs. Harris went round the room, hunting after her spectacles, when they were comfortably reposing on the bridge of her fine Roman nose.

A knock at the door!

A note for John!

'Enclosed find $500 to pay John Harris's house rent the coming year. A Friend.'

John rubbed his eyes and looked at his mother; his mother looked at me, and I looked at both of them; and then we laughed and cried till we nearly had regular hysterics.

But who was the 'Friend?' That was the question. We were all born Yankees, and did our best at 'guessing;' but it didn't help us. Well, at any rate, it was very nice, all round. I hadn't to be routed. No, nor John, nor his dear old mother. And pussy purred around as if she had as much reason to be glad as the rest of us; and the canary thrilled so sharp a strain that we were obliged to muffle his cage and his enthusiasm, with John's red silk pocket-handkerchief.

Mrs. Harris and I had not got our feminine tongues still, the next day, when John came back, in the middle of the afternoon, with another riddle, to drive our womanly curiosity still more distracted. He was requested to call immediately—so a note he had just received, read—at Mr. —— & Co.'s, and 'accept the head clerkship, at a salary of $1,400 a year, being highly recommended by a person, whose name his new employers decline giving.'

That was a great puzzle still. John and his mother had rich relations; but, though they had always been interfering in all their plans for making a living, they had never been known to give them anything except ——advice, or to call on them by daylight; and it wasn't at all likely that the 'leopard would change his spots,' at that late day. No; it couldn't be John's rich relatives, who were always in such a panic that their cousins, the Harrisses, lived in an unfashionable part of the town, dined at one o'clock, and noticed trades-people and mechanics.

We were too sensible to believe in fairies, and who the mischief was emptying the 'horn of plenty' that way at our feet, was the question.

When we awoke next morning, we found in the backyard, a barrel of apples, a barrel of flour, a keg of butter, and a bag of buckwheat flour; labelled, 'For John Harris, —— street.'

John declared, (after pinching himself to see if he were really John,) that he fastened the gate the very last thing before he put on his night-cap. Mrs. Harris said somebody must have climbed over and unfastened it; and I jumped right up and down, for a bright thought had just struck me, and I was determined to hold on to it, for I didn't have a bright thought every day.

'What now?' said John, as I capered round the room.

'Oh, nothing,' said I, 'only it takes a woman after all, to find out a secret, and to keep it too,' I added, snapping my finger at him.

That day I thought it would do me good to ride about in an omnibus. I tried several. It did'nt make much difference whether they went up street or down, or where they finally stopped. I was looking more at the passengers.

By and by I saw the person I wanted. Said I in a whisper, sitting down beside him, 'House rent—clerkship—flour—butter—crackers and buckwheat; all for giving you a seat in an omnibus!'

Didn't I know that 'the fairy' was the nice old man with silvery locks? Didn't he bribe me to hold my tongue, by telling me that he would get a peep at John and his mother? Didn't he come? and didn't I look as much astonished when he called, as if it hadn't been settled two days previous? But how was I to know that Mrs. Harris would turn out to be an old love of his? How was John to know, when he felt such an irresistible impulse to be kind to the old man that his hair had grown white living his mother?—How was the old man to know why he loved John so well, and thought him one of the finest young men he had ever seen? How was I to have known that I was to turn out to be what I always so mortally hated—a feminine match-maker?

A Sabbath in New York.

"Mee-ilk—Mee-ilk—Mee-ilk! Whoop! Right away! Hurry up there,—Mee-ilk!"—It is the everlasting screech of the milkman that wakes us, an hour before our time. We adjust the shutters to exclude the light; and fall again into a nap, out of which the news boy startles us—"'Eres the Sunday Courier, Dispatch, Mercury, Sunday Herald, Sunday Times,—got the great calamity—got the fearful loss of life." It is of no use—we may as well get up. But if Major Westervelt would offer fifty cents reward for every news boy who wakes up citizens on Sunday morning, we would consent that he let the dogs go unpounded, and run the risk of hydrophobia in thankfulness.

And yet, if they had not screamed so, these "cheerfull bells," that ding-dong every half hour of the morning, and seem to ring a half hour at each ringing, would have chased away all rest of this sort.

Open the window and let in the blessed air. Shut it again; instead of the blessed air, there enters a nauseous stench, wafted from the butcher's shop around the corner, where they practice trying out their spoiled hog-fat every Sunday morning. But it was diluted with a cloud of dust—for that let us be thankful.

It is almost church-time. The carriages are rolling past already. There is our good deacon and his sprightly wife. They always ride, although it is only six blocks off; it exercises the prancing horses and keeps the carriage from rusting. On other days they prefer walking. Make a note of the driver. He looks like other men, but he differs from them very materially; he has not any soul. Our good deacon thinks a great deal of men's souls. But as he never gives his driver an opportunity to go to church, it is quite evident he hasn't any. What? ride in the cars? They pass the church door indeed, but it is wrong to ride in them on Sunday. If you must ride, hire a carriage, but don't encourage car-travelling on this day.

Hush, my dear fellow, don't be whistling secular tunes—the tune that the organ was playing? Indeed it was not. Our organist was improvising a voluntary with Mendellsohn in his mind. The resemblance to a popular air was only accidental. Honi soit, qui, &c.

Our pastor seldom does better than he does this morning. His fervor kindles with the heat of the weather. His eloquence knows no abatement because the house is but half filled, the multitudinous faces are inspiring him from every quarter. He is now telling us new things, but old ones that our consciences know too well already. He is leading us to repentance. Our beginnings of evil we recognize as our beginnings of trouble. We grow sad—we are like to be battered by—"Fire! Fire!" "Put her through." "Heave ahead, boys." "Into the rascals." "Give 'em fits; now men, show 'em what you are made of." There is a fight in the street. The rival companies have effected a meeting, and are bruising each other, and the alarm of fire was only a ruse. The Sexton closes windows and doors, and the sound of the preacher's voice is again recognized. But what is he talking about?—we have lost the connection entirely. Once more the attention is secured. The children are awakened. The preacher's words affect them. It is still enough to hear the fall of a led pencil in the farthest corner—when, lo! a military procession which has been out to bury a dead officer, is returning. As sure as our ears are our own—there can be no mistake—the band is playing "Jordan's a hard road to travel." The little girls giggle, the boys snicker and beat time. Better close up, good pastor; small impressions can your best admonitions produce upon an auditory thus disturbed. Open the doors, Mr. Sexton—let the jingling of the bells on the horses and the rumbling of the cars before the door be heard.

We return to our homes. We tell our boy, as we walk homeward, that he ought not to buy lemonade of the woman on the corner, and remind him that the well-dressed men we met who swore so loudly were not gentlemen. We tell him that is a low place—that grocery on the corner whence the sound of revelry issues—albeit, it is the store we send him to for potatoes, because they are sold a penny or two cheaper than elsewhere, besides out of a smaller measure. He meets his day-teacher riding out on the avenue and his classmate is playing marbles on the pavement. We have a misgiving that possibly the City is not the safest place to bring up a family, and suspect that it is not the most profitable place for adults to spend a Sabbath.—N. Y. Tribune.

An Abduction Indeed.

We copy a passage from a paper read before the American Geographical Society by Captain Gibson, lately returned from the East Indies, and bringing with him some new facts as to the tribes of orang-outangs inhabiting the deserts of that part of the world. He say:

My statement of the extraordinary peculiarities of these apparently semi-human beings, has led to the expression of so much curiosity to know more of them by some, and of skepticism as to the fact of their existence on the part of others, that I have deemed it due to myself and to public curiosity, to give some additional facts along with all the corroborative evidence that has fallen under my observation.

While at Mintok, Palambang, and Batavia, I heard many remarkable stories of the agility, audacity, and especially of the superhuman strength of the orang-outang. I will trespass upon your attention by relating one of the most extraordinary, and at the same time one of the best attested, which I heard while in Batavia.

Lieut. Shock, of the Dutch East India army, was on a march with a small detachment of troops and coolies on the south-eastern coast of Borneo; he had encamped, on one occasion, during the noonday heat, on the banks of one of the small tributaries of the Bangarmassin. The Lieut. had with him the domestic establishment, which included his daughter, a playful and interesting little girl of the age of thirteen.

One day, when wandering in the jungle, beyond the prescribed limits of the camp, and having, from the oppressive heat, loosened her garments and thrown them off almost to nudity, the beauty of her person excited the notice of an orang-outang, who sprang upon her and carried her off. Her piercing screams rang through the forest to the ears of her dozing protectors, and roused every man in the camp. The swift, barefooted coolies were foremost in the pursuit, and now the cry rings in the agonized father's ears that his daughter is devoured by a binatang—again that an orang-outang has carried her off. He rushes, half frenzied, with the whole company to the thicket from whence the screams proceeded, and there, among the topmost limbs of an enormous banyan, the father beholds his daughter, naked, bleeding, and struggling in the grasp of a powerful orang-outang, who held her tightly, yet easily, with one arm, while he sprang lightly from limb to limb, as if wholy unincumbered. It was in vain to think of shooting the monster, so agile was he. The Dyak coolies, knowing the habits of the orang-outang, and knowing that he will always plunge into the nearest stream when hard pressed, began a system of operations to drive him to the water; they set up a great shout, throwing missiles of all kinds, and agitating the underbrush, while some proceeded to ascend the tree. By the redoubled exertions of the whole company the monster was gradually driven towards the water, yet still holding tightly to the poor girl.

At last, the monster and his victim were seen on an outstretching limb overhanging the stream; the coolies, who are among the expertest swimmers in the world, immediately lined the banks; the soldiers continued the outcries and throwing of missiles. He clasped his prize more tightly, took a survey of the water and then of his upward-gazing enemies, and then leaped into the flood. He had hardly touched the water, ere 50 resolute swimmers plunged in pursuit; as he rises, a dozen arms are reached towards him; he is grasped: others lay hold upon the insensible girl; the orang-outang used both arms to defend himself, and, after lacerating the bodies of some of the coolies with his powerful nervous claws, finally succeeded in diving beyond the reach of his pursuers, and escaping down the stream, while the bleeding, insensible Ledah was restored to the arms of her father and nurses, in whose hands she was ultimately restored to consciousness, health, and strength once more. This savage version of the classic story of Pluto and Proserpine is well authenticated, and the girl, now a grown up woman, is living at Ambonya, in the Moluccas.

Latent Poisons.

Dr. Doremus, an accomplished scientific savan of New York has demonstrated, by careful experiment, that the Soda Water, drawn from Druggists fountains not much used, holds in solution a most virulent poison, tending to the destruction of human life; or at least, that it is highly detrimental to health. This substance is formed by the action of acids contained in the Soda Water upon the copper and lead used in the manufacture of the reservoirs in which this popular beverage is usually kept.

His experiments prove that one and a half grains of metallic copper are present in one quart of mineral water. The immense amount of mineral water consumed during the summer months, renders this a subject of great general importance. It is thought by Dr. Doremus, that cases of cholera are frequently induced by drinking this impregnated liquid, and instances are known of the most melancholy results ensuing, where it has been used.

It is to be hoped that those of our druggists who are largely engaged in this business, and every one using fountains (the bottled article is found to be entirely free from the traces of poison), will take special care to see that the tin lining of the condensers are perfect before they dispense the refreshing goblets of Soda Water to thirsty buyers. With the thermometer again creeping up to the hundred, it is dismal intelligence that suffering humanity, may not quaff an effervescing Soda Water without at the same time imbibing a malignant poison. Phil. Register.

Coup-de-Soleil, or Sun-Stroke.

Many fatal errors are committed in the first moments of alarm on the occurrence of this accident—errors, the evil consequences of which all the subsequent skill and care of the physician are sometimes ineffectual in remedying. The prominent symptoms of the attack are giddiness and faintness, amounting in some instances to complete insensibility or apparent death.

The first and the best thing to be accomplished is to remove the patient into a cool room or shady spot, laying him carefully on the back, with the head very slightly, if at all raised. Send for a physician. Sprinkle the face with cool water, untie all strings, handkerchiefs, or bandages from the throat, chest or waist. Rub the hands and feet briskly, and if the patient can swallow, administer a little brandy and water, or spirits of hartshorn in water, in small quantities at a time. Promote free respiration by fanning and preventing the crowding of persons around. Prevent strenuously the drinking of large draughts of cold water, however urgent the request of the patient may be, until reaction takes place.

If there should be any delay in the arrival of a physician, and the patient should not rally, the rubbing of the limbs must be continued, and, in addition mustard poultices may be applied over the soles of the feet and the pit of the stomach, and an emetic of mustard and water may be administered, particularly if the patient, as is too often the case, immediately previous to his seizure has been drinking cold water in large quantities. Such precautions judiciously, consistently and perseveringly used will frequently restore animation and produce reaction, after which the patient must be treated by a physician.—American Medical Monthly.

Rules for Butter Making.

The Massachusetts Committee on Dairies says:

Your Committee having had much experience in butter making, offer the following rules as the result of their experience:

The newer and sweeter the cream, the sweeter and higher flavored will be the butter.

The air must be fresh and pure in the room or cellar where the milk is set.

The cream should not remain on the milk over thirty-six hours.

Keep the cream in tin pails, or in stone pots, into which put a spoonful of salt at the beginning, then stir the cream lightly each morning and evening; this will prevent it from moulding or souring.

Churn as often as once a week and as much oftener as circumstances will permit.

Upon churning add the cream upon all the milk in the dairy.

Use nearly an ounce of salt to a pound of butter.

Work the butter over twice to free it from the buttermilk and brine, before lumping and packing.

Be sure that it is entirely free from every particle of buttermilk, or coagulated milk, and it will keep sweet as long as desired.

In Scotland a syphon is sometimes used to separate the milk from the cream, instead of skimming the pans.

Nebraska.

The information on Nebraska is meagre at the most. Although the fullest and most accurate that has met my eye, is that to be found in the large volume of Col. Fremont, containing reports of his expeditions to California and Oregon in 1842-3-4. The volume contains, in addition to Fremont's narrative, reports on the botany of the country, by those having charge of these departments; also, astronomical observations, &c., &c. Horn's Overland Guide to California, is a thin book, and its information is confined to routes taken by emigrants. Owen's Geological survey gives information on the geology of Nebraska, and Schoolcraft's large work on the Indians gives quite full statistics on the Indian tribes of the territory.

Nebraska is so named from one of its largest rivers, the Nebraska, or Platte. According to the returns of the last census, it contains 136,700 square miles, or territory as large as New England, New York, and South Carolina. It should be stated, however, taking the southern line at 37 degrees, as Mr. Douglas proposes, the Territory as thus organized, will be much larger than the portion that has been usually designated as Nebraska, embracing a large portion of Indian territory, and most of the Indian tribes, except the Choctaws, the Creeks, the Chickasaws, the Seminoles, and a portion of the Cherokees.

Nebraska, as proposed to be organized, will be a vast region, having the various climates that are enjoyed in Missouri, Iowa, and Minnesota, that lie on its eastern border; only the climate, like the face of the country, is more Asiatic. The eastern portion of it is chiefly prairie, and rich alluvial. The middle is more sandy and barren, containing the great American desert; and the western is mountainous, the highest mountains being covered with almost perpetual snow.

The inhabitants of Nebraska may be 75,000, mostly Indians. The whites are military men, Indian agents, and missionaries. Within a week, paragraphs have appeared in the papers, announcing that a newspaper is about to be published at old Fort Kearney, the Nebraska Democrat, and that a post office is to be established some forty miles from it, for the accommodation of emigrants—two important elements to begin the work of civilizing the territory.

Nebraska is, and ever must be, mainly an agricultural region. It is far from the oceans, and has no great lakes. The Platte river, though from one to three miles wide, is only navigable for steamboats forty miles. From even what the Indians have accomplished in agriculture, the country seems to hold out great hopes to the farmer. The Indians there are mostly supported by agriculture, and according to returns before me, four tribes of Christian Indians on the northern and southern banks of the Kansas, cultivate four thousand acres. From these they raised, in a late year, 80,000 bushels of corn, 2,690 bushels of wheat, and 12,000 bushels of oats, 4,000 hogs, and 200,000 melons of different kinds. They kept 660 working oxen, and a large number of horses. The annual value of their products is put down at $31,000. The number of these Indians is placed at 1702.

The territory is not well wooded. Poplar, elm, birch, willow, pines, white oak, maple, and other trees, are found here in moderate numbers. The cotton-wood tree much abounds on the rivers. Wild animals, such as buffaloes, deer, elk, antelopes, abound in this country.

The territory is capable of supporting a large population. The people are impatient to have an organized territory, that they may make State after State of it. No wonder that the question, if that is indeed the question, whether these shall be free or slave States, should greatly excite the various sections of our land.—Cor. N. Y. Eve. Post.

Interesting from Kansas.

Westport, Jackson Co., Mo.
June 28th, 1854.

To the Editor of the National Era:

Dear Sir:—I have left my Ohio home and friends, and have come here, for the purpose of selecting myself and family a future home in this, the fairest portion of God's earth. A struggle is before us. It looks as though the inhabitants of this county think that they can people, or dictate who shall people, the whole Kansas Territory.—They in the start flocked into the Territory by hundreds. Men would take perhaps a dozen claims, stick their stake, mark their names, get up a little meeting, resolve to protect each other and each other's claims.—They also resolved, at all hazards, that Kansas belonged to, and should be settled exclusively by slaveholders. After this, nine out of every ten return to their Missouri homes, supposing that they have fixed, beyond the possibility of repeal, the institutions of Kansas for all time to come. Meetings are held in Missouri, where lynching is publicly recommended, as the last resort, to drive those "white-livered Abolitionists" out of Kansas into Nebraska, which they condescendingly say is "set apart for us." A few Northern men already have been driven from the Territory; others frightened away. A few slaveholders already have moved in with their slaves. The Methodist missionaries sent here for the purpose of enlightening and Christianizing the poor Indian, have their slaves to do the drudgery of the missions: thus, while they are enlightening and Christianizing one class of heathens, as an auxiliary in the good cause, they are grinding down and blotting out the very souls of other heathens. Indeed, it is a question whether they Christianize or heathenize the most.—Of course, the influence of those large mission establishments is against us.

At Fort Leavenworth, the United States officers are degrading themselves and their calling, by going with the South, and hooting at Northern men, and even justifying lynching of them, for no other cause than that they are Northern men! A dark picture, truly; but think not that it has no bright side; Northern men have been found who could not be scared; settlements have been commenced, slaveholders have become frightened, already we hear—"they will not trust their slaves there!" I have just made a trip over into the Territory, found on the Indian reserve scores of families from Iowa, Illinois, Indiana, and other States, and still they come.

Next week we are to have a general meeting up on Kansas river, where hundreds of freemen will be rallied; a fiat will then go forth that will sound the death knell to Slavery, in Kansas, at least. All we ask is, for Northern men, and Southern men, tired of Slavery, who design emigrating here, to come now! Now is the time they can suit themselves with homes; and, above all, now, or soon, this Slavery question must be met, and settled. During our trip over into the Territory, we saw the Baptist Missionary—a pure and warm Anti-Slavery man. We also took dinner at the Friends or Quaker mission; found the superintendent, Friend Fayer sick, but were kindly received by his family, and Richard Meudenhall, their teacher, and his amiable wife—all strong Anti-Slavery people, to whom we are indebted, not only for their kindness to us, but for much valuable information. Say to freemen "Come on, secure a home, and assist in this great struggle between Slavery and Freedom!"

Our nearest post office, at present, is Westport, Jackson county, Missouri.

Yours, truly,

Samuel N. Wood.

Slavery by an Eye-Witness.

Last August I visited a retired agricultural district of Virginia, wishing to see my friend and to look at Slavery with my own eyes. I sailed from New York in the good steamship Roanoke for Richmond. On the upper part of the covering of the paddle-wheels I noticed the figure of a strong-built man with his foot upon the neck of the prostrate figure of a massy man, with these words under them, "Sic semper tyrannis"—thus let it always be to tyrants. If the prostrate figure were white and the other black, no such ship would land at a port in Virginia. We had a delightful sail, and I found the best of company on board.

We reached Norfolk next day in the afternoon. I had never seen a slave; and as soon as the ship was secured I landed and took a stroll through the town. The slaves appeared to me to be dressed nearly as well as labourers in a free country, but not so cleanly. From what I had heard of slaves, I supposed they would bow and crouch to me when I passed them, and be exceedingly bland and obsequious in their manners; but in place of this they were not so much so as free people. When I met them they did not seem to notice me, and when I spoke to them they answered in the fewest possible words. I was much struck with the sad and sorrowful expression of their countenances. They generally looked as white men do when they are helpless and without hope. This accounts for the plaintive air of the negro melodies. Sad is the song of the oppressed heart!

It was dark when we left Norfolk, so I could see nothing of the slaves along the banks of the James River until the morning. We reached Richmond about noontime.—The country along the banks of the river, as far as I saw it appeared far inferior to that along the Hudson. The residences of the planters along James River are not equal to those of the farmers and New York retired merchants on the North River; and the negro huts around the planters' houses are not at all like the beautiful, thriving, and healthy villages on the Hudson. As far as I could judge from the ship, the negro huts were low, and large enough for only one room, without windows, and generally without chimneys. In one end of the hut, and up near the roof, there is a sliding board, which, when pushed to one side, admits the light and air when the door is closed.

After I reached my friend's plantation I entered some of these huts. As a general thing they have little or no furniture. No chairs, no beds, nor anything almost which usually adorns the home of the poorest free workman. So far as I could see into the huts along the railroad between Richmond and Charlottesville, they were in the same condition. Is it wonderful that they run away from such comfortless homes?

As a general thing, the slaves in that section of the country are not driven very hard, and yet in almost every tract of five or six miles you would hear of some severe master. A slaveholder in Charlottesville told me of a master who held a plantation next to his. This man began his slaveholding life by hiring himself as an overseer. After laying up a little money he rented a plantation, and hired slaves to work it. He gave these slaves plenty of good food to eat, but drove them with the whip at their work. "Did he not," asked I, "unfit them for their work by his whippings?" "They were never," answered he, "excused from labour on that account. Besides," continued the slaveholder, "he knew how to whip them so as to give them the most pain with the least lasting injury. He used to lay them on their faces and whip them with switches from the heels up to their neck, but so skilfully as not to lame them and make them unable to work. By the severe treatment of his slaves, and good management of his plantation, he made the labour of each hand worth 500 or 600 dollars a-year to him, and soon became a rich man.

I was told in other quarters of severities similar to this; but, as a general thing, the slaveholders in the region I visited were too lazy to drive very hard, and yet the slaves seemed to me to work more constantly than free labourers do. The treatment of the slaves is generally in the following way, as far as I could see it: About the break of day they are called up to their work and sent immediately to the field: in hoeing time, for instance, with their hoes. These hoes are great heavy things: one of them would weigh nearly as much as two or three of those used by labourers in the North. They work with these great things—men, women, and half-grown boys and girls—until dark, without any time for rest. When I observed that they loosed their horses from the plough for two or three hours during the warmest part of the day, I asked whether it would not be well to let the slaves rest also?—They told me that the work of the horses was harder for them than the work of the slaves was for them; and besides, that the slaves would take it easier when they felt tired, but the horses were driven, and could not.

For breakfast the slaves got bacon, corn-bread and some kind of milk; the same, with the addition of some vegetables, for dinner; and bread and milk for supper. After supper, when they become sleepy they lie down on the floor of their cabins, and some of them sleep all night in the field, if they feel too tired or lazy to come home. They told me, that if a woman has a child they sometimes give her a bed; but beds for the common hands are things not thought of. The slaves on the plantations were not so well dressed nor as clean as those in Norfolk and Richmond. It seemed to me that the plantation slaves never got a change of linen next their skins, and that their clothes were of the coarsest and most common kind. The slaveholders have reduced them to the state of brutes in all things as nearly as possible, without impairing their usefulness as labourers, or as articles of sale. This is the common state of the slave in the district of Virginia which I visited.

Were a man to reduce me to such a condition, there is nothing worse which he could do to me without taking my life. Yet the men who do such things are received into the churches as members, and even as instructors and officers in the churches. It is true, that in all the other relations of life the slaveholders may be, and the most of them are, good men. But the Thugs of India were also good husbands, kind fathers, obliging neighbours, and agreeable companions. The Thug at once kills his victim and takes what he has: the slaveholder keeps his alive, that he may, through his whole life, not only take what he makes by his labour, but also his children. What despot of Europe does so many cruel and unjust things to his subjects as the kindest slaveholder does to his slave? And we talk about liberty!

When in Richmond I fell in with a free mulatto. This man told me that there were a great many hard masters in Richmond, and that many of them starved their slaves, and flogged them without mercy. While he was talking to me, an old slave came up to buy some bread. "Now," says he, "there is what I have been telling you of. That old man has helped by his labour to bring up three generations of white people, but now, being nearly eighty, and unable to do much, they have turned him out to knock about for himself." I asked him what he meant by knocking about for himself. "He looks about," was the reply, "for little jobs, and gets now and then a few cents to buy bread, and a man who lives near his owner's takes pity on the poor old man, and lets him sleep on his hay-loft." "But," said I, "are there not laws which bind the slaveholder to provide for his old and infirm slaves?" "I know not," said he, "whether there are such laws or not; but if there were they would not enforce themselves; and who would take the part of that poor old man against a popular and wealthy family? They turn them out all over to die like old horses when they can work them no longer."

When I was waiting at the depot for the cars on my return home, a slaveholder came and sat down beside my friend and me, and said to him: "Have you heard about that old man who has been shot?" My friend said he had. "I feel," the other slaveholder went on to say, "very sorry about it; for old Peter, who has been shot, was my wife's slave, and knew the most of any negro man I ever knew." I saw my friend did not wish me to hear anything more about it, but I began to question the slaveholder about the murder. In answer to a great number of questions, he told me that old Peter was nearly seventy years old; that he had been his slave a great part of his working life: that he had become old and a little unwilling to work: and since he had been brought to him by his wife, had been so long with him, and knew so much, he made up his mind to sell him, and thus avoid any difficulty with him: that he had allowed him to chose his own master, a thing for which he was glad since things had taken such a turn: that his new master, who gave him seventy dollars for him, was too severe to the old man, causing him, although seventy years old to look for work for himself, and bring him home three dollars a week, and flogging him too severely if he did not bring so much: that on receiving a very severe flogging, the old man fled to the woods: that knowing the circumstances, one of the neighbouring planters had been even so indulgent to him as not to shoot him down for not coming when called to come: that he came out of the woods now and then to seek for something to eat; and that one day Dr. R. L. told his son to put a little powder into his gun and flash it at the old man; but there being something heavier in the gun than powder, the old man was shot mortally, and found dead two or three days afterwards in such an awful state of decomposition that it could scarcely be determined whether it was old Peter or not.—"This was his end at last," he added, "but my conscience is clear; I thank God for it." I asked him whether they would not punish the Doctor and his son. "No," said he, "the coroner could scarcely determine whether the body was old Peter's or not, and the Doctor feels very sorry that his son should have done such a thing."

When in the cars on my way to Richmond, I sat on the seat next behind this same slaveholder; and thinking over in my own mind what he had said about the indulgence of the planter in not shooting down the old man at once, when he did not come to him at his call, I asked him whether the laws of the State allowed a white man to shoot a runaway slave, if the slave did not come to him when he called him. The slaveholder thought a little about the question, and then turned to a man on the seat before him, and having conversed about something with him a minute or two, he turned again to me, and said that the laws of Virginia did not allow any such thing. "Why?" said I. "Because," said he, "the principles of the good book would not allow of such a thing." "But," said I, "would a white man do it, and would the laws punish him?" "There are very few, indeed," said he, "who would not shoot the slave down." "If the laws punished such a thing, men would be afraid to do it." He was talking to another man about an acquaintance of theirs, whom he alleged to be too good a man to be allowed by his friends to live without a hope of another and better world. I asked him whether the man who flogged old Peter so severely, and took his money from him, had a hope. "Yes," said he, "he was taken into the Baptist Church a short time before."

I stopped all night in the Citizen's Hotel, in Richmond, and waited for the Jamestown to start for New York at four o'clock in the afternoon. The Citizen's Hotel stands on a street running east and west. In this street and east of the hotel, there are four auction rooms for the sale of slaves, and so near to each other that the auctioneers could stand at the doors of their own rooms and talk to each other. Early in the morning there were red flags hung out with a piece of paper hung on each of them, telling how many men and women, boys and girls and children, were to be sold.

At about nine o'clock a number of people began to collect around one of these rooms, and by-and-by a light mulatto young man began to ring a bell on the front of the room and around the streets in the neighbourhood, announcing the commencement of the sale, and inviting the people to go in and obtain great bargains for their money. The room was large, with benches only around the walls, and a stand near the middle of it for the slaves to stand on during the bidding. When the room was pretty well filled, the active little mulatto fellow who rang the bell invited the buyers to go and see the slaves examined. He took the men, one by one, behind a screen, and made them strip themselves naked to their skins, and then he showed their bodies all around to the buyers, and made remarks about their good points as a man does when he sells a horse. There was one lot in this room which seemed to me to have been brought to the hammer on account of the debts of their owner. There was first a woman with a baby of two or three years old, and a son about ten or twelve. This last they offered to sell separately. Another woman, of a light colour, with a baby of some eleven or twelve months, with long and light-coloured hair, and a white skin. One of the dealers asked this woman whether the baby's father was not coming to buy it, but without waiting for an answer, said that he supposed he had no money.

The next of this lot was a nice-looking old lady of about fifty; and lastly, the four or five men who I had seen examined. The slaves of this lot seemed to be very disconsolate and unwilling to be sold: for when the women were asked about their health, they mentioned some maladies to which they said they were subject. When the agent of the creditors observed the game which they were trying to play, he became very angry, and told the people that he would settle the thing by having the woman examined. He sent for a doctor, who examined the most complaining woman, and announced to the people that she was sound. When the light-colored woman with the white baby was put upon the stand to be sold, the tears fell from her eyes faster and thicker than I ever saw tears falling from any eyes before; but the auctioneer went on as coolly as if he were only selling a cow and her calf. When the others had all been sold, they brought up the old woman. She pretended to be very lame, and so infirm that she could not get upon the stage without great difficulty: no one offered any thing for her, and her old boss, as I supposed, offered five dollars, and she was struck down to him.

When she came down from the stand I followed her to where her old husband had been standing and watching the sale. They both shed many tears when they met. I said to the old man, "Why are you crying now? you got your wife again." "Oh!" said he, "I am so glad I cannot help it." After the slaves were all sold here, the sale began in another room across the street. The lots in this and the others did not seem so bad. They seemed to have been bought in different places and brought there by traders.

These traders buy clothes for them before the sale, from a shop in the same street. Some of the women and girls were rigged out very gaily, and seemed well pleased with their dresses. There was one tall young woman in the first room, about twenty-five years old, who was quite handsomely dressed for the occasion. Several of the buyers talked to her, and asked her what she could do, looked at her hands to see if she had been used to work, made her open her mouth, and looked at her teeth; and one of them asking how many children she had had, and whether she was with child now, publicly felt her with his hands as a physician would do. To such indignities are men and women subjected in this free country. Thus human nature is honoured among us. When they were all sold in this room, we went to another, and then to the fourth one. Nearly the same things were seen in all of them. It has been denied to me, even by those who had lived in Virginia, that slaves were sold there, but now I have seen the thing myself. Besides, I was told that every Court month there is a sale of slaves at Charlottesville. I do not blame the slavedealers as much as some do. I have already told you that they dress their slaves before they are set up for sale, and after the sale. In one of the rooms I observed the trader give four or five slaves some money. I asked them how much he gave them each. They told me that when he bought them he promised them five dollars each, if they would give him no trouble, and that now, since they were sold and off his hands, he had given them the money. They seemed very proud of the money, and said to me that it would buy them a great many things.

I do not now think that freedom will be established in these lands as soon as I at one time hoped it would be. It would be as easy at this time to persuade the people of New York city to give away their houses and furniture as it would be to persuade the people of Virginia to give up their slaves. It is useless to tell them that free labour is better and cheaper than slave labour. They know it is not so for their purposes. If it were so, they would have found out for themselves, for they have both free labour and slave labour among them.

There are about fifty-five thousand free negro labourers among them, besides a greater number of free white labourers. They try the two kinds of labour, and greatly prefer the slave, both for its cheapness, tractableness, and, in coarse labour, for its greater efficiency. Slavery may be the cause of public poverty and waste, but to the slaveholder himself it is very profitable.

One evening, as I was returning to the house of my friend, I met a coloured man.—I asked him whether he was a slave. He said yes; and in answer to a number of questions he told me that his owner received 130 dollars a year for his services as a blacksmith, that the man to whom he wrought fed and clothed him, and gave this money over and above to his master, and that he had eight children. Now, supposing the average length of the man's working days to be thirty years, this owner will receive 3900 dollars for the labour of this one slave. Then his eight children, at twenty-one years of age, and after they have more than doubly paid by their labour for their maintainance during infancy, will bring at least 800 dollars apiece—6400 dollars. This, with the above, makes 10,300.

One morning I went to the mill with my friend. While he was engaged in some business, one of the millers and I fell into a conversation, and while we were standing at the door a slave girl of fourteen or fifteen went past us. Said I to him, "Is that your slave?" "No," said he; "I have been trying to buy her from her owner, from whom I hire her, but he will sell her for no less than 600 dollars. I have offered him 500." In answers to a great many questions, he told me that the girl was honest, faithful and industrious, and that such a slave was very valuable property: that his father once had a slave woman who wrought as a blacksmith, and had eleven children. Now let us estimate the woman's labour at 100 dollars a year; thirty years would bring 3000 dollars; her eleven children, at 800 dollars each, would bring 88,000 dollars: the two items 11,800 dollars. Was not this woman a valuable article to this miller's father? It is the immense value of such good women and men that makes us at the North cowards, that bribes our press and corrupts our pulpits.—New York Tribune.

SOUTHWARD BOUND!—At the celebration at Earle, Waukesha Co, Wisconsin, on the 4th inst, after the fireworks, two balloons were set up, to one of which as attached an effigy of Douglas, with the following inscription:—

"Douglas, the Traitor—Southward Bound."

The balloon, when allowed its freedom, made straight for the South, and, we believe, has not been heard of since!

CHOLERA IN JAMAICA.—The whole island is described as being in a most miserable state from the ravages of this disease, which attacks equally all classes without distinction. Whole villages are made deserts by the death of the inhabitants, and very many have been totally abandoned. Very few persons there survive the attack.

Hunting Land.

The Elora Backwoodsman says, "crowds of men 'hunting land' pass through Elora weekly." The rush to the backwoods is unprecedented, and in less than two years there will not be a lot for sale between this place and Lake Huron. The Government will be forced to buy a township from the Indian territory, if they wish to supply the demands for lands. One good township, we are credibly informed, could be secured from that point of land jutting into the lake, and marked on the maps, Indian Territory. It would be well to look after it. It contains a good sprinkling of pine, and capital facilities for manufacturing lumber, which could be more easily taken to market from there than any other portion of the back country.

We wonder how many colored men there are among the crowds of land hunters passing through Elora! We wonder if they know that there are hundreds of acres of land in other parts of this Province, just as good, cheap, or indeed far cheaper, than in the Counties of Kent and Essex, where they at present seem so disposed to locate! Well, they will know if they will only "read the papers," and if, when they come "across the lake" in search of homes, permanent homes, they will go to the land offices, where there is a possibility of finding out, instead of walking about and depending entirely upon what friends—who are themselves very likely, so much engaged in their various employments, that they have not the opportunity of knowing—tell them. "In less than two years there will not be a lot for sale between this place and Lake Huron." Is not this fact ominous. Should it not teach colored men in the States, that in remaining there and waiting for the "dark clouds"—which are said to be indicative of the bright day about to burst upon them—to be dispelled, that they are pinning their hopes upon an uncertainty, upon a phantom, which as they approach, it always recedes, and eventually may vanish entirely from their sight; while here, is placed before them an absolute certainty? Not the certainty that that they may at one day obtain rights, but that they are now in full possession of them. They will know that 100 acres of good land can be bought in many good localities for the price of one year's rent of a house in some third or fourth rate street in our large cities, and ten years to pay for it in. With these facts before them, and more to be obtained just for the asking or a little examination; we hope that our friends may be induced to think and act. Now we do not like to think so, but the thought has occurred to us that there is a great dread on the part of too many of our colored brethren of going to "rough it in the bush." We know that there are many men who come here after having lived the greater part of their lives on old farms in the States, where they had fine roads over which they could whirl away to town in an hour or two whenever they wished; and whose wives have never seen a deer or wild turkey except in print, who, on coming here and finding lands in the vicinity of the towns a little too high for their capital, shrink from going into the bush. Why? Because, forsooth, in the first place, it is too far out of the way, they want to be where people are, as if twenty-five years ago the now fine city of Toronto was not a 'bush,' as if the first trees had not to be cut down, the first farms to be opened up, the first ——ville to spring up, which in course of time comes to be the first town or city in the county; then again, their wives do not want to go, they could not live out there, where they would have to "walk the logs" or get in the water when going to their neighbours, where they would see nothing but the green trees in summer and their naked branches in winter. Oh no! they must stay in town, where it is so "handy for getting any little thing you want!"

Good timid souls! as if the trees did not have to be cut down before the pretty smooth roads over which they have been accustomed to walk, were made; as if the ees will not always stand there, if not cut down, and as if, although they can now get anything they want so easily, after they have been a few years in the 'bush' it will not be—if they will only go in sufficient numbers, almost—a fine open country from whence they can go to the ——ville, that will by that time have been ushered into existence by the needs of the surrounding country, and get anything they want, which thing or things will not be needed half so often as in town, for there will be an abundance of home production. Let every man then, who has health, is not too far advanced in life, and has no trade, but is dependent for his subsistence on the various occupations about town, resolve to shoulder, not his musket, but his axe, and away to the woods, and when in his old age he looks over his broad acres, he will have reason to thank the Lord for having given him the determination to go forth. C.

We give below an extract from a work entitled "The West Indies Before, and Since Slave Emancipation, comprising the Windward and Leeward Islands, Military Command," by John Davy, M.D., F.R.S., Inspector-General of Army Hospitals.

"It is well that all this should be made out, and such trivial distinctions abolished. Did we not know how great is the tendency to error in the human mind, and to delusion, we might feel surprised that they had ever been seriously entertained. Had the African races preceded the European in civilization, and had they made slaves of the white men, most likely they would have thought as meanly and spoken as contemptuously of them, and have adduced proof not less convincing of the white being distinct from the black and a lower species. An enterprising traveller in Africa mentions an anecdote in point. In a discussion with some natives relative to the power of the white man and negro, it is said, "Another free black took upon himself to ridicule the constitution of the white man." "Ah," he cried, "what is a white man? a poor weak creature; he can't bear Soudan heat, he gets the fever and dies. No, it is the black man that is strong, strong always; he never droops or sinks—look at the strength of my limbs." And how truthful are the exclamations in the manner in which they are applied. The white man is indeed a feeble creature in the climate for which he was not designed, as is the African in that fitted for the white man. The specialities of each, it should be remembered, are not defects but, as before observed, provisions wisely bestowed to meet the exigencies to which they are exposed. The negro in Barbadoes does not require a face-cloth to protect his face; the black colour serves the purpose; it, like black paint on a white face, prevents the sun's rays from having a burning, inflaming effect. The thick crisp hair of the negro, and his thick perennial bones, it can hardly be doubted, are also wisely intended as a protection from the same agency, as is also the dark colour of his eyes. A like remark applies to his soft skin favouring perspiration, by which it is kept cool, as well as by its black colour favouring radiation. Moreover there is unquestionably in his constitution or organic frame a something, we know not what—an influence or power of resistance which makes him proof against malaria, and the destructive fevers resulting from what we call malaria, when acting on white men, which has made the western coast of Africa "the white man's grave," and has rendered active military service so fatal to European armies when employed in tropical climates."

We think that the author has unwittingly committed an error, in asserting that the African is a feeble creature in the climate fitted for the white man, for although the climate of the white man may have been the only one fitted for him, it does not, to our mind necessarily follow, that it was not also equally fitted for the black man. Indeed, we think that facts will bear us out in the assertion, that as the crow is said to be the "type of all birds" living in a state of health in all temperatures, so the black man is the type of all men, enjoying as good health, and a mind as sound, if not more so—while the mind of the white man in the Tropics is said to become weaker—in cold as in warm climates. It is said that some of the most efficient seamen in the Greenland Fisheries have been black men. Who ever heard of the death in consequence of undergoing an acclimating process, unless from undue exposure, insufficient clothing, and the like; just as will occur with European emigrants—of native Africans, brought directly from the burning sands of their fatherland, to North America and other cold countries?—No, no! we think it is a mistake; for we know that the mortality is no greater among them in these regions, where we have the frosts and driving snows, from four to seven months of the year, than among the same classes of whites; although in a majority of instances not possessing as great a share of the comforts of life, as is enjoyed by the others. That the mortality is no greater, did we say? nay, that it is seldom as great; for we know that it has been a subject of remark, that black people are not so liable to attacks of the various diseases prevalent in the warm seasons, as are white persons; while the same is true in regard to those engendered mostly, during the cooler portion of the year.

Our opinion is, that the black man was correct, when he said the black man "is strong, strong always," and also that if the cooler climates only are designed for the whites, that the whole earth is for an inheritance for the black man and his descendants forever.

"The black colour serves the purpose; it like black paint, on a white face, prevents the sun's rays from having a burning, inflaming influence. A like remark applies to his soft skin favouring perspiration, by which it is kept cool, as well as by its black colour favouring radiation."

Now these, we think, are two as prominent mistakes as we remember lately to have seen; to believe them, we will have to unlearn what we, and persons generally, have been taught on the subject of radiation.—Woe betide the poor creature who should have a coat of black paint put on his face, and then expose himself to the rays of such a sun as we have had for the last week or two.

The black colour favours radiation, we always thought that the reason black is black, is, because it absorbs all of the rays, and that white is white, because it throws them all off—just the reverse of Dr. Davy's theory; but there always will be new developments we suppose, and these are some of them. The Nebraska Bill and American Ministers.

The following extracts are from the speech of the Rev. J. B. Walker, delivered recently in Exeter Hall, at the Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Anti-Slavery Society:

"There is another clause in the resolution which I think very important. It makes honourable mention of the clergy of New England, for their remonstrance against the Nebraska Bill. I rejoice greatly in what the clergy in America have done. They have acted firmly, and almost without dissent, over the whole country; but the clergy of New England are not in advance of other sections of the free States on the subject of Slavery. It would be admitted in the United States, even in New England itself, that Western ministers utter anti-slavery sentiments in their pulpits more frequently and more firmly than ministers at the East.—The East have greater facilities of co-operation with each other, and what they do is heard of more frequently on this side of the water. Western ministers remonstrated as early as those at the East, and although so many of them could not unite in one petition, yet they each had a 'heart to the work,' and they laboured both in the pulpit and out of it as abundantly as others.

"But it ought to be known here that this Nebraska question is not a good test of the anti-slavery character of a Christian minister. I see that one of the ablest of our religious papers—the Independent—says that the ministry moved on this question before much was said about it politically. This is not exactly correct. The gentlemen who manage that paper probably did so. Politically they may be relied upon to oppose Slavery wherever it affects the institutions of the country; but before the New-England remonstrance was signed, two New-England States had shewn, by their elections, the almost unanimous opposition of the people to this Bill. And there is another thing which ought to be known: this Nebraska Bill is a political measure, and any man may oppose it without losing influence or losing caste in the churches. This question does not try the principles of ministers in the United States on the subject of Slavery. It would be unpopular in the free States generally for them not to oppose the measure. I believe that Dr. S. H. Cox has his name upon the remonstrance against this Bill; and even the New York Observer, which swims in the wake of public sentiment, to fatten on the offals thrown overboard, opposes it.

"It cannot therefore be a test of anti-slavery sentiment. In my opinion the test of an anti-slavery sentiment in America is the position which ministers hold in relation to Slavery in the churches. Slavery is connected not only with our republicanism, but with our Christianity. Our great denominations and benevolent Societies extend all over our States, including slave and free States, and Slavery puts its black finger upon the heart of everything that has fellowship with it. Let me state briefly the facts in the case, in a few instances which may serve for all. The facts that I am about to state may be evaded, but they cannot be denied. They shew that the churches of Christ in America are to a great extent in bondage to the slave-power.

"Now, it is this power of Slavery in the churches and benevolent societies of our own land that is the true test of the anti-slavery character of Christian ministers in America. We lose nothing by protesting against the Nebraska fraud. To do that is popular; but to act against the slave-power and the corruption it has produced in the churches, would cost a minister in the Eastern cities his influence, and, in many cases, his living. These great Societies have power to distinguish men who sustain them. Their anniversaries and their proceedings bring them prominently before the country; and besides their influence, they wield the power of money, which is mighty in our land. The ablest man among us would lose caste in New England, if he were to take ground against the action of the American Board or the American Tract Society on the subject of slavery. Men may speak in a certain way against the policy, but they dare not act against it by open protest, or by withholding support, or by patronizing the new Societies which have no fellowship with Slavery. This, in my opinion, Sir, is the anti-slavery test of Christian ministerial character in America. It is humiliating to see those known as anti-slavery men sit in their great Boards without uttering a word of protestation, willing to be gagged, so that they may not even discuss the subject in their public meetings."—*A. Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

DEAR FREEMAN:—I observed an article in Frederick Douglass' Paper of the 30th of June last, headed "Colored People in Canada," which notwithstanding your pointed and excellent rebuke of it, demands a passing notice at my hands, on account of two or three absurdities contained in it.

First, in speaking of the future of the coloured people in Canada, he says they will measurably solve the problem, whether the coloured man can rise to independence and respectability among the whites, when he has anything like fair play for the exercise of his faculties and powers. Now, Mr. Freeman, there is no problem in the matter to solve. It is an admitted fact, on the part of all true friends of the coloured people, founded upon proofs long since in existence, that they are equal to other races; but it is the policy of their enemies to bury those evidences in oblivion if possible, in order that they may the more successfully carry out their crusade against the intellectual capabilities of the coloured race. Hence the African Colonizationists say it is a problem, and they are moving heaven and earth, as it were, to send them to Africa, in order that it might remain a problem in America.

Mr. Douglass sanctions the doctrine, and says that they have a chance in the future to solve the problem in Canada. Thus in 1854, Mr. Douglass publishes to the world that coloured people have yet to give evidence of a capacity to live with the whites on equal terms.

Again, Mr. Douglass tells us that we are one people, and that there is no merely Canada interest to uphold. No one denies that we are one people, so far as origin is concerned, and our sufferings have been one and the same; but I deny that our positions are the same. This, Mr. Douglass admits, when he says, "character, not colour, is the condition or criterion of respectability."

Here a coloured man can be a magistrate or a legislator, for aught that the law or popular prejudice opposes thereto. Now let us compare this with their condition in the States. In order to which, I think I cannot do better than subjoin a short article I find in the same paper:

"The meetings were well attended, and the speaker frequently applauded. Who will say, after hearing Fred. Douglass, that a 'negro has no sense?' Shame on any land that holds such flesh and blood in bondage! Think of such a man possessed of such a mind, capable of electrifying breathless audiences, swaying them at will with his resistless eloquence; think of such a one, fleeing from the lash, from the blood hounds, surrounded by the hirelings of a free government, kidnapped, hand-cuffed, whipped and dragged back into hopeless slavery—pleasant picture, it is not?"—Chautauque Democrat.

In view then of the superior privileges enjoyed by the colored people in Canada to those in the United States, is it not reasonable that they should feel jealous at any attempts made to blend without discrimination, the position of the people of color in Canada with those in the United States, and so place them in the eyes of the world in the same degraded condition. We live under a government of equal laws, we want no new schemes gotten up under the pretence of bettering the condition of the colored people in Canada. We have not yet forgotten the many frauds that have been practised upon the public through the name of the refugees in Canada. We are British Subjects, having the benefit and protection of the best system of government in the world. If we have any real grievances, we can appeal to it with confidence, that such appeal will be attended to. We are men in Canada, and therefore want no hawking about in our name. I call upon Mr. Douglass to point out what particular services have Messrs. Smith and Watkins rendered more than other men, who long preceded them in this city and province, whose services have been far more eminent in giving character to the colored people of this province, than those gentlemen whom Mr. Douglass has been pleased to eulogise as the most prominent of the men in the city. The men among us, who are of the most service in giving character to our people, are those whose attention to their business is of more importance to them, than to be running after Mr. Douglas, to be known of him and others as Lions of Toronto and Canada. As to the character of the colored people in this city and province, prior to the coming of Messrs. Watkins and Smith, I pray that it may be as good now as it was then; for testimony was then borne to its fairness by honorable members in our parliament—among them the Honorable H. Sherwood—who said the colored men of this city, by their frugality, had earned for themselves a high character. Indeed, I could give many more testimonies borne by our white fellow-subjects, if time would admit, long before Messrs. Watkins and Smith, I presume, thought of coming to this province.

A DESCENDANT OF THE AFRICAN RACE.
Toronto, July 27th, 1854.

For the Freeman.

At a Meeting of the Colored Citizens of London, held in the Baptist Chapel, Horton Street, to take further measures for the support of the "Provincial Freeman":

A. B. Jones, Esq., was called to the chair, and Rev. Thos. H. Thompson appointed Secretary pro tem.

The claims of the Freeman were then ably presented by M. A. Shadd, the General Agent of the Association.

Speeches were made by several persons, expressing their approbation of the course hitherto taken by those concerned in the conducting and managing of the Freeman, and their hope for its continuance and permanency. And, after emphatic condemnation of those "begging schemes" now existing, or being set on foot, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

1. Resolved, That this Meeting cordially approve of, and concur in the movements of the Directors and Conductors of the "Provincial Freeman," and pledge ourselves to give it our most hearty support.

2. Resolved, That as there are in Canada ample facilities for support and progress, and, as Colored people, who have resided here for a time, compare favorably with the same class of their White fellow-subjects, all things considered, we emphatically condemn and shall oppose begging, made for whatever purpose, in our name.

Voted, That a Tea Meeting be held in London for the paper.

Also Voted, That we organize a section of the "Provincial Union."

Yours respectfully,

A. B. JONES, Chairman.

THOS. H. THOMPSON, Secretary.

The Insurrection in Spain.

From the Correspondent of the London Times.

MADRID, July 3.

There is no positive news here this morning respecting the progress of the insurrection; but, on the other hand, we have abundance of rumors, nearly every one of which has its opposite and contradictory report. The Gazette announces that a strong division of troops of all arms is to be sent out actively to pursue the insurgents, and I have just heard that it is to march to-day; but I presume this will depend much on the arrival of the 1,500 infantry and 300 horse from Valladolid. According to despatches received by the Government from the Alcaldes of the Escurial and Guadarrama, these troops were to pass last night at the latter place, 10 leagues off. Marching again, as is customary, at 4 o'clock in the morning, they ought to be here by 2 or 3 this afternoon, unless the insurgents meet them on the road, and either persuade them to join them, or attack them if they refuse; so that, before closing this letter, I shall probably be able to write more positively on this head. The head-quarters of the insurgents are at Aranjuez. It is said they have formed a sort of Provisional Government—which was to be expected—and that they publish a Gazette of their own. All the accounts we receive of their strength are very vague, some stating it to have nearly doubled—an exaggeration which is, perhaps, based on the supposition that they have been joined by the Valladolid troops; which, however, is not the case, unless it has occurred this morning. If the insurgents have gone to meet them, it is clear that they must have done so at a considerable distance from Madrid, for otherwise, if the newcomers refused to join them, and the garrison of Madrid moved out, they would be exposed to find themselves between two fires. The Gazette announces that one of the four insurgent generals was no longer with his companions yesterday evening, and the government people say to-day that General Messina has abandoned the insurrection. This is the construction they would naturally put upon his separation from them; but another, quite as probable, is that he had been detached with part of the forces, possibly to meet the troops from Valladolid, which are commanded by the Marquis of Villavieja (Colonel Zaldiver), an officer of no great military reputation.

Terrible Explosion & Fortunate Escape.

WATERVILLE, July 8, 1854.

On the morning of the fifth of July, as the Waterville Military Company, with their field piece, was returning from Hamilton, where they had been to assist in the celebration, and within about three miles of home, two of their companies, sitting upon the magazine of the gun, met with the most remarkable adventure we ever witnessed. The conveyance of the company consisted of four double teams, two of them on a waggon, and two on the gun and about fifteen rods in advance of the other. It appears the gun caps, either through the negligence or ignorance as to their nature, were left in the magazine, containing six and a half bugs of powder, of two pounds each. We suppose the motion of the gun over the road ground the caps together, producing a friction which fired them, thus igniting the powder, and all blew up with a terrible explosion, easier to be imagined than described.

The air for several feet around presented one confused mass of buffalo robes, cushions and fragments from the inside of the magazine. There was so much smoke it was impossible to see what became of the unlucky occupants of the seat, but as it cleared away we discovered one of them getting up from the ground, and the other a half a mile distant astride one of the wheel horses, his clothes on fire in several places, and exhibiting the tallest specimen of flying artillery we ever saw. It appeared upon inquiry that the driver was blown up the length of the reins, falling back on the pole to the gun, and afterwards getting on one of the horses and succeeding stopping them. But the most remarkable of all, nobody was seriously injured, although one of them is somewhat stiff.

To many this may seem incredulous to burn thirteen pounds of powder beneath a person or persons without causing their instant destruction; but one acquainted with the principle and strength of the magazine, and taking into consideration that the clasp confining the cover must give away first, that one pound of powder might be sufficient to break it, while ten pounds would add but little to its force, they must conceive that it was possible, although a most remarkable and fortunate instance. The report of the explosion was a dull heavy one, and heard for some miles, and its effect on the wheels was such they could scarcely move next day. The driver's companion, soon after getting off from the ground, expressed a regret that his associate should have parted company with him so unceremoniously; he had no time to bid him "good bye."

The Sandwich Islands.

WASHINGTON, Wednesday, July 19, 1854.

I have positive and undeniable information, from the highest sources at Honolulu, to the effect that a Treaty is about concluded between Mr. Gregg, the United States Commissioner, and the Government of the Islands, for their annexation to the United States forthwith. The only unsettled question in relation to the annexation is, whether the Islands shall come in as a Territory, or a State. Mr. Gregg insists on the former. The Administration here at Washington is perfectly advised as to the position of the negotiations.

This is kept a profound secret at Honolulu to all out of the court circle. The King and Privy Council have the constitutional power to make the treaty, and in fear of filibustering or something else in the way of foreign invasion, they are exercising it. The native population is undoubtedly opposed to annexation, while the majority of the foreign residents desire it.

A woman has been fined in Boston lately, for stealing newspapers from doorways, after they were left by the carriers; whereupon a Boston paper remarks truly, that "much of the blame incurred by carriers of papers for neglect of duty, doubtless attaches to persons who steal papers after the carriers have carefully deposited them at the doors of subscribers."

Free Church Synod.

The following remarks show the animus with which the Free Church Synod is likely to enter the Clergy Reserves question. We have italicised certain words.

The subject of the Clergy Reserves came up on Tuesday, when the following deliverance of the Committee on that subject was submitted and adopted without a vote—Dr. Willis alone objecting to one particular:"—

CLERGY RESERVES.

The Committee on Reserves and Rectories are clearly of opinion, that the time has now come when the perplexing question of the appropriation of these lands are to be settled finally. They would have fondly clung to the appropriation of them to the purposes of education, as already stated in Acts of this Synod, but find serious difficulties standing in the way; and objecting strongly as they do to the plan of endowing systems of religious opinions diametrically opposed to one another, and respecting the conscientious views of such bodies in objecting in toto to an ecclesiastical appropriation of public funds at all, your Committee recommend to the Synod their unanimous and strong approval of a thorough Secularization Bill by which the funds in question shall be withdrawn entirely from their present offensive position, and handed over to the general civil fund of the province, to be administered as any other civil Funds are for general purposes, but in no sense for ecclesiastical uses of ANY kind.

THE CLERGY RESERVE LAND.

As great ignorance still appears to prevail on the subject of the Reserve endowment, notwithstanding all that was printed about it, we copy a statement of the present condition of the funds, both in Upper and Lower Canada:—

UPPER CANADA.

Number of acres reserved for the Protestant Clergy, under the authority of the Act of 1790, being one-seventh of all the lands surveyed up to 1840,	2,412,200
The quantity authorized by that Act was only ⅛; in consequence of which, there remain to be deducted	300,000
Number of acres sold up to 1st January, 1853,	1,364,302
Number of acres given for the 57 Rectories,	16,018
Number of acres unsold, January 1853	1,032,850
Annual revenue from the Reserve Fund,	£31,104

Distribution of Annual Revenue.

Church of England,	£11,110
Church of Scotland,	7,550
Roman Catholic,	1,660
Methodist,	777
Non-Conformist Ministers,	676
Surplus undisposed of	5,518
	£31,404

LOWER CANADA.

Number of acres reserved for the support of a Protestant Clergy, under the Act of 1790, being one seventh of the granted lands,	934,052
The quantity authorized by the Act was only one eighth to be deducted in consequence,	127,156
Number of acres sold up to 1st January, 1853,	392,362
Number of acres unsold	541,759
Annual interest from the fund,	£3,540

Distribution of Revenue in Lower Canada

Church of England,	£2,189
Church of Scotland,	1,094
Surplus undisposed of,	256

The endowments in Lower Canada have been very ill managed—since nearly 400,000 acres have been sold, with an apparent net result of only £55,000: but there still remains a very large quantity of lands undisposed of, which must now be of great value—of far too much importance to permit of the whole question being settled, without the consent of Lower Canada being asked.

Distressing Occurrence.

Last evening, about six o'clock, immediately after the steam ferry boat International had passed up the river, from the railroad terminus at Waterloo, some gentlemen who were fishing on Bird Island Pier, observed a man in the centre of the stream, swimming steadily and lustily for the American shore.

At first they imagined he was bathing but soon discovered that his clothes were on and no boat near him. They then realized the fact that he had fallen accidentally into the water, from the International, and was drowning. They hurried to the shanty, and started at once to rescue the unfortunate man. As the boat neared him, he appeared to strike out with strength and spirit in an attempt to reach it, and his rescue seemed almost beyond a doubt.

When only 3 or 4 feet distant, however, and at the very moment that the oars of the rowers were stretched toward him to assist his swimming, the poor fellow's strength forsook him and he went down. The boat continued for over half an hour around the spot in the vain hope of seeing him again, but after sinking he never rose to the surface. The persons on the ferry boat were evidently ignorant of the occurrence, and there is no possibility of telling who the deceased was, until his body is recovered.

A canal boatman lately shot an eagle in Onondaga county, measuring six feet from tip to tip of the wings.

The first electric telegraph in Australia commenced working early in March, between the Custom-house and Government offices at Melbourne and Williamstown. It is to be extended to Geelong and Port Phillip Head.

Mr. Stephenson's tubular bridge over the Nile, at Benha, will be fit to rank by the side of the imperishable monuments of ancient Egyptian industry. It is to have ten arches, and is to be 870 feet in length. Unlike the Britannia bridge, the railway will pass over the top.

The lady Godiva procession in England on the 19th June passed off with great eclat. The lady of the show appeared in robes, in place of light dress and skirts, as heretofore. A second lady, however, from the Royal Academy, appeared in the legitimate form, and rapturous applause greeted her in all directions. This lady was preceded by a splendid banner, bearing the words —"With the pure all things are pure."

A PLUCKY OLD GOVERNMENT PENSIONER.—A very interesting circumstance occurred at the Admiralty, the other day. A fine-looking, hale old man presented himself, requesting to be appointed to the war fleet, stating that one of the Captains would be glad to have him, and, though he would not likely be au fait at "going aloft," still he could "stand well to his gun" yet. The old fellow turned out to be Billy Medham, the sailor who saved Captain Broke's life at the "Battle of Chesapeake and the Shannon," who entered the Customs Waterguard in 1819, is now on the Customs superannuation list, at 74 years of age, and who plies the boat on the ornamental water in St. James' Park. No decided answer was, we believe, given by the Admiralty; but a messenger was sent to the old man, with a couple of guineas from a donor incognito.—Civil Service Gazette.

LAST MOMENTS AND BURIAL OF CAPTAIN GIFFARD.—The Kreutz Zeitung gives the following description of the last moments and burial of poor Captain Giffard, under the head of Lower Danube, June 12:—We have received interesting dates from Odessa of the 2nd of June. On that day at three, p. m., the interment of Captain Giffard, of the Tiger, took place. By order of General Osten-Sacken, the whole crew, prisoners of war, as well as the Governor General Annemkoff, with the other military authorities, attended the funeral. A Russian battalion in parade order formed an escort to the coffin, and fired the usual volleys over the grave. Nearly the whole population was afoot, and followed the procession. The sturdy General Osten-Sacken took the deepest interest in the fate of the captain during his illness. A little before his death, Giffard called the crew around his bed, and said—"Lads, you owe your lives to my being wounded; this hindered me from blowing up the ship. Farewell! Greet our dear England for me when you see it." After these words he asked for a glass of lemonade, turned his face from the sailors to the other side, and gave up the ghost.

We learn by the English papers that Lieut. Sir Henry Blackwood, of the English Navy, attached to the frigate Leander, died recently at Athens, Greece. He became favourably known to some of our citizens during the brief visit of the Leander to this port last summer, with the Earl of Ellesmere and suite.—N. Y. Post.

TURKISH LIBERALITY TOWARDS RUSSIAN SICK AND WOUNDED.—Letters from the Danube mention that the Russian army, retreating from the Principalities, leaves in the hospitals a great number of sick and wounded, who were unable to follow the army. The most formal orders have been given by the Turkish authorities to respect them, and to deliver passports to the Russian medical men who should remain behind to attend the sick. During the siege of Sillistria the Turks afforded the Russians every facilities to bury their dead, and to render military honors to the generals and officers who fell in the different engagements. In the last assault, General Meyer, commander of the 5th brigade of Foot Artillery, was wounded, and a lieutenant-colonel of artillery killed. Five other officers shared the same fate. The next day the corps of the army which invested the place retired beyond Araptrebia.

The cholera in its worst form had broken out on board the Australian emigrant ship Virago, which put back to Liverpool with 50 deaths

One hundred and eighty-six persons died in one day at Marsailles of cholera.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.—Wright's circular of July 14th, report crops doing well in all the growing districts throughout the country; and although showers have been pretty generally experienced during the past week, the extensive draining now so universal has prevented any mischief, beyond retarding the maturity of wheat and corn. A low temperature is causing a fear for potatoes; and already rumors of disease are in circulation, which must be received with caution. The corn market has been dull; and prices both of wheat and flour have favored buyers, who act on the reserve and restrict operations to immediate wants. Indian corn improved in value, and in more request.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GRIFFIN of St. Paul's East Smithfield and seconded by the Rev THOMAS JAMES Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL R WARD, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after their escape from the United States and believing that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Love's Ambition.

BY JAMES NACK.

Oh that I were a king
In golden pomp arrayed!
And thou, most beautiful,
Wert but an humble maid!

Then would I say to thee,
"Oh best beloved of mine,
Behold my crown and throne,
For throne and crown are thine!

"In truth thou art not sprung
From those of royal race,
But nature's royalty
Adorn thy form and face.

"I climbed the lofty heights—
I found them drear and bare;
I sought the deepest vale—
The sweetest flower was there!

Now, from thy rosy mouth,
I hear the gentle sound—
"Oh let that flower remain
Still in its native ground!

"Its beauty and perfume
Live in this mossy place;
Why break it off to die
Within a golden vase?

"I ask not for my brow
A coronet of pearls—
Give me a budding rose
To place among my curls!"

I fling my sceptre far,
Deep, in the deepest sea—
For what are crown and throne
Without thy love for me?

'Tis not a crown of gold
Can match thy brighter hair—
'Tis not a diamond wreath
Can with thine eyes compare!

Had I as many crowns
As shine the stars above—
Oh I would give them all,
Sweet maiden, for thy love!

And yet I must repeat—
And thou wilt not upbraid—
Oh that I were a king,
And thou an humble maid.

Yankee Doodle.

In the summer of 1775, the British army under the command oi Abercrombie, lay encamped on the east bank of the Hudson River, a little South of the city of Albany, awaiting reinforcements of militia from the eastern states, previous to marching upon Ticonderoga.

During the month of June, these raw levies poured into camp, company after company, each man differently armed, equipped and accoutered from his neighbour, and the whole presenting such a spectacle as was never equalled, unless by the celebrated regiment of merry Jack Falstaff.

Their outre appearance furnished great amusement to the British officers. One Dr. Shackburgh, an English Surgeon, composed the tune of Yankee Doodle, and arranged it to words, which were gravely dedicated to the new recruits. The joke took, and the tune has come down to this day. The original words, which we take from Farmer & Moore's Historical Collections, published in 1824, we have not, however, met with before in many years:

Father and I went down to camp,
Along with Captain Goodwin,
Where we saw the men and boys
As thick as hasty-pudding.

There was Captain Washington,
Upon a slapping stallion,
A giving orders to his men—
I guess there was a million.

And the feathers on his hat,
They look'd so tarnal fine,
I wanted peskily to get
To give to my Jemime.

And there they had a swamping gun
As large as log of maple,
On a deuced little cart—
A load for father's cattle.

And every time they fired it off,
It took a horn of powder;
It made a noise like father's gun,
Only a nation louder.

I went as near to it myself
As Jacob's underpinnin,
And father went as near again—
I thought the deuce was in him.

And there I saw a little keg,
Its heads were made of leather—
They knock'd upon't with little sticks,
To call the folks together.

And then they'd fife away like fun,
And play on cornstalk fiddles,
And some had ribbons red as blood;
All bound about their middles.

The troopers, too, would gallop up,
And fire rite in our faces;
It scar'd me almost half to death
To see them run such races.

Old Uncle Sam came there to change
Some pancakes and some onions,
For 'lasses cakes to carry home,
To give his wife and young ones.

But I can't tell you half I see,
They kept up such a smother;
So I took my hat off—made a bow,
And scampered home to mother.

A Wolf Story.

A correspondent of the Buffalo Republic, who is out west on his travels, relates the following story of a wolf hunt which occurred near Indianapolis twelve years ago, and the principal actors in which are still living: The relator says, that several weeks after a grand hunt, in which a large wolf had escaped, while some of the hunters were returning to the village they discovered a wolf eating a sheep newly killed. On giving the alarm several men collected and went in pursuit. They found him, although in the daytime, still regailing at the carcase, and at once gave chase. After running more than half a day, having had several severe battles with the dogs, and being closely pressed by the hunters, he took to the hills and shortly entered a den.

"Do you see," said he, "where the ground is broken yonder?" pointing to the earth thrown up at a distance from us. When we came to the spot, "here," said he, "was the den. Knowing he was in, we fell to digging. Having penetrated twelve feet, a lateral hole was discovered leading off to a great depth. In that the wolf had taken shelter. It was large enough for dogs to enter, and several were sent in, but after a short fight they came back pretty well scarred up.

"At last we let in a hound, which immediately fastened on the wolf, and remained in the den with him, unable to bring him out. The dog was a cross of the bull and terrior, and when once set on in earnest, he never broke his hold without the command of his master. We waited some time for him, the struggle in the hole rising to a perfect fury, when it was proposed that some of the men should crawl in and help the dog to drag the wolf out, as we were sure, from the noise of the fight, that the dog had set his jaws on him somewhere. But who should go down into that den and take part in a fight between a hound and a wolf, in the dark? Putman once descended into a wolf den, but he had a lamp and a rifle. But here was a double danger, for there was no prospect that either the wolf or dog would end their fighting short of death. The hole was descending, and he must enter nobody knew how far, head downwards without a light, and if he ever returned it must be by creeping backwards up hill, in the dark, with the dog and wolf battling for life in the den beyond! Putman descended with a rope attached to him, so that on giving a signal he could be drawn up if necessary. But we had no rope, and whoever went in must run his risk of getting out again without help.

"With all these dangers, a young man, Samuel Shannahan, still living in the neighborhood, promptly volunteered to descend. He soon reached the bottom and found the dog with his jaws fastened immovable upon the wolf's cheek. Shannahan seized the dog by the hind legs and attempted to back up with him, but found it impossible to get up. Another man now descended and got Shannahan by the legs, while two or three reached in and took hold of him. Thus linked in a twenty foot chain Shannahan was drawn up holding on the dog whose jaws had not unlocked all the time during the struggle, and the wolf was taken and killed. He was of the largest size grey wolf, an old offender, fat on mutton and veal, and measured over seven feet."

Fanny Fern, Her Success and its Cause.

The following from the New York Tribune presents the most remarkable instance upon record, of sudden and surprising literary success; and clearly unfolds the secret of that wide and wonderful popularity which Fanny Fern has so suddenly obtained:—

The secret of Fanny Fern's literary triumph we take to be her fidelity to nature and her sympathy with the most universal tastes. She has none of the airs of professional authorship—does not become starched and prim at the sight of pen and ink—and has hit on one great art of good writing, to make it as much like the free talk of the writer, as the nature of the subject allows. Her style is free from all bookishness—all hard traces of weary study—and flows on as easily and blithely as the song of vernal birds. At the same time, it shows an alert and observing spirit, a flexible fancy, and a love of fun, which she could not curb if she would, and would not if she could. Her taste for satire is indeed tempered by warm, womanly sympathies—otherwise it might be mischievous—but now though she cuts and thrusts with nimble alacrity, she leaves no venom in the wound, which she has made less in malice than sport. With her perennial mirth, she blends a genuine sense of the pathetic, and often relieves her brilliant flashes of humor, with a sudden burst of sympathy. Her tendencies are progressive, and truly democratic. Her heart is with the people and warms to homely joys and sorrows.

A generous scorn of baseness and injustice often gives point to her sarcasm; while her love of truth and beauty leads her to detect all the elements of goodness in common every day life. She always takes the side of the weak and oppressed, as by unerring instinct. Her fancy, it is true, often runs riot—she overlays her pictures with blood-red tints—and seldom resists the temptation to an audacious extravagance; but she never forgets the heavenly "quality of mercy" nor lays aside her tenderness toward the weak, or her sympathy with every form of suffering. Such traits give Fanny Fern her popularity with the great mass of readers. They seek for what is natural, and warm, and impulsive and humane, and of this they never fail in her writings.

The contents of this Second Series of "Fern Leaves" are of a more varied character than her previous volume, and fully sustain the characteristic reputation of that work. They are arranged in a natural order, and taken as a whole, are adapted to produce a still deeper impression of the writer's originality and power. It is superfluous to say they will be read everywhere, and that whoever takes up the book once will not leave it without a complete perusal.

WASHING-DAY IN THE BALTIC.—Some of the officers in the Baltic have been writing home to their mammas for the means of washing and ironing their own linen, as well as for ample instructions how to "get up" a shirt. One gallant youth entreats that full directions may be given him as to the whole details of the operation, with hints where to begin and where to leave off. He also urges his mamma to send him by an early packet a packet of starch, for though he is prepared to pay a stiff price for the article, he does not like to be without it, as its absence prevents him from showing a bold—shirt—front to the enemy.

It is to be regretted that the thoughts of our naval officers should be absorbed in the washing-tub at such a critical moment, and, there is reason to fear that they will have too many irons in the fire, if they are found ironing their own collars when they ought to be mangling the breast-works of the enemy. A lieutenant with his hands in the suds can scarcely be prepared for a sudden emergency, and we would therefore recommend a naval hero to learn to "rough it" with his linen as well as with every thing else while on active service—Punch.

Punch represents Nicholas as an ass who has allowed himself to be shut up in a pound, and all the European nations, conspicious among which is John Bull, stand looking over the fence at him, but no one dares to get inside to put the bridle on. Turkey has let down one bar, and reaching a hand through has got hold of his tail, and implores France and England to go in and take him by the head, but they manifest a most decided disinclination to take hold of the biting end. A better illustration of "the war" which was going to shake the whole continent of Europe we have never seen.

Land Sales.

A correspondent inquires concerning lands. In reply we give the following abstract of lands now for sale:

Mr. Edward Emery, of London, C. W., advertises an important sale of Town lots, to take place on the 19th day of June. Terms of payment, one-eighth down, or by notes at three or six months, if required; the balance in ten equal annual payments, with interest.

F. B. Beddome offers for sale a valuable farm also 2½ miles from London, parts of Lot No. 1, 2d Concession of Lobo; also wild lands, lot 3, 1st concession, four miles from the town.

There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches anxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper governmen

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS,
JOHN D. PECK,
AMOS G. BEMAN,	Committee on Manual Labour School.
JOHN JONES,
J. D. BONNER,
J. MCCUNE SMITH.

1. The title shall be "THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL."

2. The foundation fund shall be thirty thousand dollars.

3. Twenty thousand dollars shall be in stock of 2000 shares, at ten dollars per share.

4. Ten thousand dollars shall be in donations to be solicited from the friends of the cause.

5. The shares shall be payable, ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and ten per cent. every first day of July, October, January and April thereafter, until the whole is paid in.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

b. Each pupil shall occupy one half his time when at School, in work at some handicraft, or on the farm.

c. The handicrafts shall be such that their products will be articles saleable for cash, or money's worth, at a market within easy access from the School.

The agent appointed by the Committee Frederick Douglass, Esq., shall be empowered to receive donations and take subscriptions for stock, giving a receipt for the latter, signed by himself and Rev. Amos G. Beman, the Secretary of the Committee. As soon as, and as often as the Agent aforesaid shall receive two hundred and fifty dollars, either in subscriptions or donations, he shall pay the same over to the Treasurer, John Jones, Esq., of Chicago, who shall deposit the same forthwith, in the Bank of America, Chicago, Ill.: the Treasurer aforesaid, as soon as he shall receive one thousand dollars, and for every thousand dollars thereafter, shall give bonds with two sureties to the President and Secretary of the National Council of Colored People, for double the amounts aforesaid. For his services, the Agent shall receive five per cent. on all stock instalments paid in by him, and ten per cent. on all donations above two hundred dollars paid in by or through him.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Aliened American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscripiucn list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe hose bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Lately, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the TRIBUNE'S Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be [illegible] with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

MEN AND BRETHREN.—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective [illegible] to the [illegible] of our people in this country. To [illegible] we [illegible] a position [illegible] to [illegible] and [illegible] necessary part of the [illegible] element of society to which we [illegible]. The policy necessary to the preservation of this element must be in our favor, if ever we expect the enjoyment of [illegible] freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights [illegible]. For this purpose, and to this end, [illegible] in favor of emigration out of the United States and [illegible] to the American Colonization scheme of [illegible] the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee of Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures and objects set forth in this Call as the Convention is specifically by and for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be bettered [illegible] if not, then, there is no part of the [illegible]-spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better, than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand [illegible] to shoulder to our brethren, and all our friends in all [illegible] as adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath, but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all the [illegible] assemblages of our people as heretofore [illegible] we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention, when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

FORGERY.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

Poetry.

Stanzas for the First of August.

BY J. M. WHITFIELD.

From bright West Indies' sunny seas,
Comes borne upon the balmy breeze,
The joyous shout the gladsome tone,
Long in those bloody isles unknown;
Bearing across the heaving wave
The song of the unfettered slave.

No charging squadrons shook the ground,
When freedom here her claims obtained;
No cannon, with tremendous sound,
The noble patriot's cause maintained:
No furious battle-charger neighed,
No brother fell by brother's blade.

None of those desperate scenes of strife,
Which mark the warrior's proud career;
The awful waste of human life,
Have ever been enacted here;
But truth and justice spoke from heaven,
And slavery's galling chain was riven.

'Twas moral force which broke the chain,
That bound eight hundred thousand men;
And when we see it snapped in twain,
Shall we not join in praises then?—
And prayers unto Almighty God,
Who smote the earth the tyrant's rod?

And from those islands of the sea,
The scenes of blood and crime and wrong,
The glorious anthem of the free,
Now swells in mighty chorus strong;
Telling th' oppressed, where'er they roam,
Those islands now are freedom's home.

Miscellaneous.

Farming in Palestine.

S. W. Jones, Esq., of Pittsfield, Mass., who is labouring to ameliorate the condition of the Jews, has written home to Dr. Reed's Culturist and Gazette an interesting letter, descriptive of the geology and agriculture of that part of the eastern coast of the Mediterranean. He says that its surface rocks belong to the chalk formation; and that the soil is naturally fertile, but wretchedly cultivated. The plains of Sharon appear to be elevated table-land, having an abundance of lime, in the form, primarily, of minute shells—characteristic of chalk—and valuable for raising grain. Mr. Jones' letter bears date January 21, 1854, in which he gives the following interesting information:

"The plains are chiefly used to raise grain upon, and to pasture flocks and herds upon. The appearance now is much as our river lands and plains are about the forepart of June. The wheat is from six to twelve inches high; barley is sown before and after wheat, and is of different ages. Dhura and sem sem is not yet sown. Sem sem bears a seed of a nature somewhat like a flaxseed, and looks a good deal like a red pepper seed, only larger, and is used to make lamp-oil.—There is nothing like a fence or hedge around the grain fields, and all the land not occupied for tillage is one common pasture; but, as in the days of old, no creature of any kind is allowed to run at large—all are under the care of the shepherds, and at night they are driven home into the fold. The first persons that we see stirring in the morning are the cattle tenders, "going forth with their flocks," and all day long they can be seen scattered in every direction over the plains, "tending their flocks," precisely as we read of in the days of the patriarchs.—The wheat is ripe in May, and before this time the rains are over, and there is no need of barns; so the grain is cut and piled up till they take a notion to thrash it, when a place is smoothed off on the ground, and the grain thown on and oxen driven over it till it is pounded up fine, and then is thrown against the wind, put into sacks and carried to market, full of every thing that can make it foul; and then people whose business it is take it and sift it on the ground in the street, when it is ready for grinding. If this land was not as rich as the garden of Eden, they would not in the way they cultivate it, get their seed. Their ploughs do not make a larger furrow than our cultivators; and what is more, they only "cut and cover:" they go round a land, or back and forth on the same, just as it happens—as their plough turns a furrow both ways, it makes no difference. Their yokes are simply a straight stick, with two pins for a bow, with a string tied across the ends under the neck; and it looks, a little distance, just like a long, low saw-horse, or a saw-bench. They use the same yoke for an ox, mule, or donkey; and they are not at all particular about working two animals of the same kind together—an ox or an ass, or an ox, a mule, or a cow is just as well as any way—the same gear fits all.

In the neighbourhood of Jaffa are some of the best gardens for oranges, lemons, pomegranates, melons, dates, bananas, etc., that can be found in the country—perhaps in any country. These gardens have to be watered during the dry season, and all the water is raised from the wells. The well is dug on the highest place in the garden, and the water raised into a pool by a crazy apparatus, turned by a mule hitched to a sweep, where it stands till it becomes warm enough to use, when it is let on to the garden by channels made for the purpose. By watering in the dry season, vegetables can be grown all the year round, and two, three, or four crops can be produced on the same ground in a year. All things grow very quick. Early Indian corn has been raised fit for eating in seven weeks from planting, and wheat has ripened in sixty days from sowing. The orange trees, and also the lemons and pomegranates, require to be watered through the summer months, in order to have them produce any good fruit.—Figs, grapes, and olives are not much raised in these gardens—they do best on the mountains and rocky places—precisely the opposite of what the products of these gardens want. A dry, stony soil, without water during the summer, is the place for them. They say here that if grapes have much water they mildew. May we not have given our grapes and gooseberries too much water or too wet a place? The oranges here are something that we, in Massachusetts have never seen. I wish I could send you a tree with its load hanging to it. They are so full that they are literally bottom upward, resting on the props. They grow here sometimes that will weigh one and a half pounds. I have seen pound ones, and I should think that I had seen them that were still larger; but it is not the largest that are the best or the most beautiful. Their greatest beauty is in their colour and number, contrasted with the deep green of the leaves. In many places on the trees they are so thick as to make one solid mass, with only room for the leaves to stick out between them. It is in time of gathering during the months of November, December, January, and February, and soon the trees are in blossom again.

Robberies among Bees.

As I cannot give all the details relative to bees robbing, I will venture a few hints, without all the reasons which dictate them. Bee-keepers, not understanding their business, are liable to considerable losses. Robberies are more frequent in spring than at other seasons; yet bees will often be trespassing at any time in warm weather when honey is scarce in the flowers. One of the greatest difficulties is the fact that but very few persons can tell when bees are being robbed; it is the most difficult of anything about the apiary. Repeated, close and patient observation alone can decide at the commencement. It is generally supposed that whenever the bees are outside the hive fighting, that they are also robbing, usually; instead of this being the case, it indicates a strong colony, and a disposition to defend themselves against all intruders. Strong families are in but little danger. I never knew a successful attack on such a stock at the commencement. A weak hive or refuse honey must first get up an appetite for pillage before any serious result will follow. It being much easier to prevent a commencement than to arrest it afterwards, it seems necessary to know the real condition of all stocks, especially in the spring. Some cool morning, raise the hive till the bees belonging to it may be seen—take a thorough view, even if the hive is to be turned bottom up; if the clusters be large, extending through nearly all the comb, not much danger need be apprehended; but should it be small, some care will be requisite. Strong stocks will be quite sure to find out weak ones and carry off their stores. To prevent which, as far as practicable, close the entrance, leaving only room for one bee to pass at a time. Should an attempt be made, they will be able to repel it much easier than if several could enter at once. Without this precaution, (and sometimes with it,) in extensive apiaries, very soon after the weak stock is discovered by its most powerful neighbor, the hurry and bustle attending the removal of the spoil is discovered by others, who will join in the plunder. Perhaps a dozen or more will be engaged in half an hour. Hence the necessity of knowing which the weak stocks are, to give them this advantage. It is a bad practice to allow too much room for egress, even to moderately strong families.

We will now endeavor to point some of the indications of robbing, as even these precautions may not always prevent an attack, although it is usually all-sufficient. Now, instead of interfering with a stock (further than the contraction of the entrance) that has already set up a defiance by combatting with their assailants, and will nine times in ten need no assistance, our attention should be given to the weak ones that may be plundered entirely without the least show of resistance. The first thing to be noticed will be an unusual number of bees apparently at work—and yet it may be the young bees that take a turn of exercise a little after the middle of every fair day; their motions when leaving the hive are so nearly the same as robbers, that an experienced eye alone can tell which it is; but this bustle of young bees will not last over an hour. When the hive assumes its usual quietness visit it again, and if you find the commotion increased, it is time to interfere by closing the hive at once. You can then let them out towards night, for the robbers to return home; or, if there are enough about, equal to those belonging to the stock, you may retain them as prisoners; and compel them to join the weak hive. All that appears necessary is to confine them two or three days; they forget home, and add considerable strength to the family. If too few are enclosed, they are killed.

All pillaging commences on our first real warm, pleasant day—seldom otherwise. If your bees have been neglected through the day, visit them after sunset of such days; robbers will work long after honest laborers are at home. To break up the habit, it is probably the least trouble to close the hive with some contrivance to admit a little air, and take them to some cool, dark, place, until at least two or three warm days have passed, and the robbers cease to look for it, when it may be returned to the old stand—they will be uneasy and try to bite their way out when left out doors. This remedy is preferable to many others, such as breaking the comb, &c. Removing the hive to some other stand after the bees have marked the location, is a ruinous practice, unless taken a mile or more. Where but one stock is engaged, by changing the stand with the weak one, as has been recommended, will often have a good effect, but where a number are engaged, which is nearly always the case, it is absolutely impracticable. Spring is the only time that we are excusable for letting our bees remain weak enough to be plundered; it is then that they should all form steady, industrious habits, but like man, when strong enough to take by force what is not their own, and the habit of living on the labor of others once established, it is seldom thoroughly eradicated, or honest labor relished afterwards.—Country Gentleman.

The Mormons in California.

It is not yet three years since the Mormons settled in San Benardino. Then it was a mere range for cattle; but by organized industry and well-directed labour, it has now become one of the most important and fruitful portions of the State. And the system which prevails among them in political matters of voting one way—of uttering their sentiments as by the voice of one man, will, with their increasing numbers, give them great power. They are neither Whigs nor Democrats, and their practice is to go for their friends. By their unity in this respect they are destined, in close contests, to control elections.

On a first visit among them, one is struck with the stillness and apparent dulness of the place; but this arises from the order of labour which their system imposes upon every member. There are no idlers; every one must produce according to his capacity; and all their labours go on in the most systematic manner. Every one you meet walks as if he was upon business. Some are ditching for the irrigation of the land; some are cutting timber in the mountains; others are hauling it to the plain; some are cultivating the fields; some are looking after stock; some are building; some trading.—Every one is doing something with a view of permanent utility. Their property is not held in common, but the church and each individual is benefitted by the labours of all the rest. So far as industry in the development of the resources of their lands is concerned, there is not a community in the State that can compete with them.

The rancho is situated at the mouth of the Cajon Pass, and all the travel hence to Salt Lake passes through the city. In the Cajon there is abundance of water for mills and for irrigation, and it is carried over the bottom lands in every direction, and will be brought through every street of the new city.

The old fort, with its ungainly proportions, will soon be abandoned. The new city, which is located a little to the east of it, is surveyed, and the lots are now offered for sale at an average price of one hundred dollars. There are already two or three handsome buildings erected, and several more are in progress. Bishop Crosby is about erecting a large hotel, which he means shall be an ornament to the city.

The Mormons never go to law, and it is very evident that they do not wish any outsiders to come among them for that purpose. They have an aversion to lawyers as stirrers up of litigation. No case has ever yet come before the State courts in which the Mormons were parties. All their difficulties are settled in the "Bishop's Court," where each party choses a referee, and their decision is final. They have no jail, and when they find a criminal, they put him in chains and set him to ditching or some other public improvement. It does a man no good, they say, to confine him; besides, confinement is an expense to the community, and they cannot afford to support any man in idleness.

There are many intelligent men and women among the Mormons; and if we are to believe them they are the most happy community in the world. No thieves, no jails, no rowdies, no grogshops—they serve the Lord in all their daily labours. The interest of the church is part and parcel of every contract. They hold on with great tenacity to the tenets of their faith, and to the revelations of the prophet Joseph, and have ever been ready to suffer for their faith's sake.

We put them down as polytheists—believing, however, in a great First Cause.—They regard Adam as the God or governing spirit of the planet. Their belief in a state of future rewards and punishments, as explained to us, is this: that by a strict adherence to, and faithful performance of, all the requirements as revealed to them by the properly delegated authority (what they term "obeying council"), they will reach a "state of exaltation" in a future world.—In other words, will be made "kings and rulers over principalities and powers;" their wives and children being sealed or married to them in this world, as also their children's children unto the latest generation, thus enabling them to stand with dignity among the just and perfect, as head and ruler of a great generation. This is their chief "exaltation." The neglect of duty and of the practice of the cardinal virtues in this world is punished by witnessing the elevation of old associates, while they are compelled to move in a subordinate and subservient capacity. They believe that, after death, they are reunited to their wives and families, and occupy the same positions and engage in the pursuits on this sphere that they did while in the flesh.

They found their practice of polygamy upon the necessity of increasing their families, and this doctrine is strenuously advocated by intelligent ladies. But we will give these ladies the benefit of this remark, however sincere they may have been in their advocacy of this doctrine with us, they allow no divided affection in their own houses. These ladies proclaimed polygamy as a beautiful conformity to the laws of God. The happiness and unity of this people, as related to us by the few we were able to converse with, gave us pleasant impressions; but we could not help thinking that, could we have mingled with the masses and listened to their tales, we might have heard things not so favourable. Polygamy may be good for population, but we do not believe it increases human affection, nor does it develope the "sweet little courtesies" which render social life agreeable. Mormonists may be good, but we believe in something better. —Los Angeles Star, May 20.

Tell Your Wife!

Yes, the only way is, to tell your wife just how you stand. Show her your balance-sheet. Let her look over the items. You think it will hurt her feelings. No, it will not do any such thing. She has been taught to believe that money was with you, just as little boys think it is with their fathers—terribly hard to be reached, yet inexhaustible. She has had her suspicions already. She has guessed you were not as prosperous as you talked. But you have so befogged your money affairs that she, poor thing, knows nothing about them. Tell it right out to her, that you are living outside of your income. Take her into partnership, and I'll warrant you'll never regret it. There may be a slight shower at first, but that's natural.

Let her see your estimate; when you come home again she will show you that you have put her bills too high. True, she had rather a costly bonnet last winter, but it is "just as good as ever; a few shillings will provide it with new strings, and refit it a little—the shape, she says, is almost exactly as they wear them now." And you will be surprised to see how much less expensive she can make your own wardrobe. She will surprise you with a new vest—not exactly unfamiliar, somehow looking as if in another shape you had seen it before—yet new as a vest, and scarcely costing a dollar, where you had allowed five. Old cravats will experience such a renovation in her hands, coming out so rejuvenated, that nobody but those who are let into the secret would suspect that they are old friends in new shapes. The dressing-gown you were going to buy—out of what forgotten chest she has gathered the materials you cannot imagine—but there it is, comfortable and warm, and just the thing you wanted for the long winter evenings that are coming on as fast as the almanac will let them.

You will find a wonderful change in her tastes and appetites. Whereas, she always fancied what was a little out of season, or just coming into the market—now if beef is dear, she thinks "boiled mutton is delightful—as tender as a chicken." If lamb rises, and fish are plenty, she thinks "a striped bass, or a fried sole, good occasionally."

Before you have thought much about it, you will find yourself spending your evening at home—and such evenings, too! so full of domestic enjoyment, and fireside pleasures, that you will look with wonder on the record of last year's expenses, and marvel that you found time or relish for the costly entertainments that so seriously taxed your pocket. If, like too many, your outgoes threaten your incomes, be sure to tell your wife of it. Not in a tone and manner that will lead her to think you don't want her to buy what is really necessary for winter, but just as if you wanted a counsellor in the day of your trouble. And if she does not come up, heart and soul, and most successfully, to your relief, put me down for no prophet.—Exchange.

Mountains in the Moon.

It is an ascertained fact, that there are two classes of lunar mountains. The first consists of isolated, separate, distinct mountains of a very curious character. The distinguishing characteristic of these mountains of a very curious character. The distinguishing characteristics of these mountains is this—they start up from a plain quite suddenly. On the earth it is well known that mountains generally go in ranges or in groups; but we find these isolated lunar mountains standing up entirely apart, never having been connected with any range.—The one named Pico is 9000 feet high; this mountain has the form of an immense sugar loaf; and if our readers can imagine a fairly proportioned sugar loaf 9000 feet in height, and themselves situated above it, so as to be able to look down upon its apex they will have an approximate idea of the appearance of Pico. There are many other mountains of similar description scattered over the moon's surface; and these mountains not only stand apart from each other, but, what is still more remarkable, the plains on which they stand are but slightly disturbed. How singular, then, the influence which shot the mountain up 9000 feet, and yet scarcely disturbed the plain in the immediate neighbourhood! The second class of lunar elevations consists of mountain ranges. Now, this is the principal feature of the mountains on earth. This phenomenon is also found in the moon, but there is the exception; only two principal ranges are found, and these appear to have been originally one range. One is called the Appenines. It is so well seen, that just as the line of light passing through the moon you will think it is, generally speaking, a crack in its surface; but a telescope of ordinary power will at first manifest it to be a range of mountain. The lunar Appenines may be compared with the loftiest range of mountains upon earth. It is 18,000 feet high and there is another range still higher, raising 25,000 feet above its base. In this feature, then, the moon corresponds with the earth, but with this difference—what is the rule on earth, is the exception in the moon.

Music at Home.

Music serves to make home pleasant, by engaging many of its inmates in a delightful recreation, and thus dispelling [illegible] ness and gloom which frequently arise from petty disputes, from mortified vanity, from dicontent and envy. It prevents, for the time at least, evil thoughts and evil speaking, and tends to relieve the minds of both performers and hearers from the depressing effects of care and melancholy. Young people need and will have amusements. If an innocent and improving kind be not provided at home, they will seek elsewhere. If they find places more agreeable to them than their homes, those homes will be deserted; and thus the gentle and holy influences which ought to encircle the family fireside, will be in a great measure lost.

"For surely melody from heaven was sent
To cheer the heart, when tired with human strife;
To soothe the wayward heart, by sorrow rent,
And soften down the rugged road of life!"

Let parents, therefore, take pains to encourage and gratify a taste for music in their children, and it will amply repay them for so doing.

Water where it is Wanted.

The manner in which the Creator has provided a supply for the thirst of man in sultry places, is worthy of admiration. He has placed amidst the burning sands of Africa a plant, whose leaf, twisted round like a cruet, is always filled with a large glassful of fresh water; the gullet of this cruet is shut by the extremity of the leaf itself so as to prevent the water evaporating. He has planted in some districts of the same country a great tree, called by the negroes Boa, the trunk of which, is of a prodigious bulk, is naturally hollowed like a cistern. In the rainy season it receives its fill of water which continues fresh and cool in the greatest heats, by means of the tufted foliage which crowns its summit. In some of the rocky islands in the West Indies, there is found a tree, called the water lianne, so full of sap, that if you cut a single branch off it, as much water is immediately discharged as a man can drink at a draught, and it is perfectly pure and limpid.—St. Pierre's Studies of Nature.

Price of Woman's Love.

A man who had struggled with a malignant disease, approached the crisis on which his life seemed to depend. Sleep, uninterrupted sleep, might ensure his recovery.—His anxious wife scarcely able to breathe, was sitting by his bed; her servants exhausted by constant watching, had left her. It was past midnight—a door was open for air; she heard in the stillness of the night, a window open below stairs, and soon after approaching footsteps. A moment more, a man with his face disguised, entered the room. She instantly saw her husband's danger, anticipating the design of the unwelcome stranger, she pointed to her husband, and pressing her finger to her lips to implore silence, held out to the robber her purse and keys. To her surprise he took neither, whether he was terrified or charmed by her courage or her affection, cannot be known. He left the room, without robbing a home sanctioned by such strength of affection.

A FRENCHMAN'S OPINION OF ENGLISH DRESS.—Black coats are in London, the uniform of respectability. It is for this reason that the coat which has been only half-worn out, finds eager purchasers at the second-hand shops. It is again sold when the buttons are worn, and it is in a sad condition to the third wearer,—who prefers this cast-off apparel of a gentleman, to the comfortable blouse he might buy for the same money. Indeed, the history of an English black coat, would make a tale at once comic and philosophic. The coat should be at first introduced upon the back of some Lord Pembroke, who had paid seven guineas for it. From him it should pass in a fortnight to his valet; from his valet to a city clerk, and from the city clerk to the crossing-sweepers, who works at the immediate risk of being kicked by the same Lord Pembroke's horses. The coat, throughout this journey, should here lose a button, and there get a hole; be shortened for one, and elongated for another wearer. At last we may notice the tatters of it in the hands of maid-servants, who are polishing grates, and from them transferred to the rag merchant. The story of the black coat is also the story of the lady's dress, which descends by degrees from the drawing-room to the gutter. That which particularly shocks a Frenchman in London, is the spectacle of servant maids, kneeling upon their master's house steps, in bonnets that were once velvet; but are now of an indescribable material, garnished with the rags of lace and feathers. Does that cook, whom we see in a dirty, ragged shawl, that was once bright and valuable, think for a moment, she is mistaken for her mistress, who, fatigued with the monotomy of the park and the opera, is distracting herself by buying her own butter and vegetables? Is it the worship of wealth, makes the poor seek its tatters—the veneration of the little for the great. The revolutions have at least corrected this with us, so that we buy the new apparel for ourselves, suitable to our individual rank.—M. Lecomte's Journey of Troubles in London.

THE REAL RAILWAY KING.—The London Times makes the following remarks, on the erection in the Great Hall at Euston Square terminus, of a statue to George Stephenson:—"In early life a collier, working for his daily bread in the bowels of the earth, he mended watches in his leisure hours, that his son might have the blessings of education. While his fame as a mechanical and civil engineer was still in its infancy, he elaborated experimentally the same result as to the safety lamp which Sir Humphrey Davy reached by the process of philosophic induction. The tramways of the coal mines and the rude forms of the first locomotive engines grew under the strokes of his vigorous intellect into a mighty system, which has already exercised an incalculable influence upon industry and civilization. That one who, when a boy, was a "hurrier" in a coal pit, should, by the force of native genius, rise to a position such as the statue in the hall of Euston station commemorates, may well be regarded as a proof that the days of romance are not yet over; nor the giants of an elder world without their types in modern times. Perhaps it is also to be viewed as a characteristic of the age, that the fame of such a man is so quietly left to the good-keeping of the good works which he has achieved. The traveller hastening on his way should pause in Euston station, to contemplate the masculine form and massive, energetic features of him who, by combining the blast pipe with the tubular boiler, first endowed the locomotive with its tremendous speed—who, during his busy manhood, superintended the construction of more than 2500 miles of railway—who thought out every thing connected with our first iron highways—and who engineered lines extending in unbroken series from London to Edinburgh."

Story of Stephen Pembroke.

Stephen Pembroke (brother of Rev. Dr. Pennington), who was recently surrendered as a fugitive slave by Commissioner Morton of New York, and carried back to the South, having since received his liberty by purchase (the sum of $1,000 being contributed by various persons for that purpose,) related his experience before a public assembly in the Broadway Tabernacle on Monday evening, 17th inst. The following report of his remarks is from the Tribune:

"I set out to escape from slavery on the 1st May last, with my two sons. We walked all night, and went fifty odd miles without stopping. We got as far as New York City, where we were violently arrested, secured, and taken back to the South. I was treated in a bad manner here. I had no counsel, and did not know what the law was. I remained fifteen days in the South under chains, locked up by night. I ate and slept chained. I was kept so till my arms swelled and my appetite gone. I was so until bought through the benevolence of the public and the exertions of my brother, whom I had not seen for thirty years. Some suppose slavery not to be what it is said to be, but I am right down upon it. I was fifty years in it, and it has many degrees. I have been in three of them. In thirty years I was sold three times. I served one man for twenty years. He was a rigid and wicked man. I have seen men tied up, whipped, shot, and starved. Then there was a moderate degree; and then I got into that, which I left, after being twenty years in it. It has left life in me, that is all. I served a man twenty years for $400, and then he wanted $1,000 for me, after starving me and depriving me of all the comforts of life and the worship of God. The slave never knows when he is to be seized and scourged. My father was sold five times. The last time he was knocked down and seized by three men. I have seen men working all day, day in and day out, with iron collars on their necks, and so locked up at night, getting a pound of corn bread and half a pound of meat. I would rather die the death of the righteous than be a slave always under dread and never getting a good word. I used to say to my master, 'I am getting old and ought to have some rest;' but he would answer, 'No, sir; if you speak about freedom, I will sell you further South.' For the last twenty years I have had a free wife, and but for her labor I believe, without the mercy of God, I would be this night in my grave. My pursuers were, I believe, in the same train by which I arrived here at 5 in the evening, and I was arrested at 7 3-4 o'clock next morning. My pursuers told me there was a watch round the house all night. I had no counsel and did not know the law, nor what I should say; so I thought it better to let the law have its course. My first wife was a slave; so my five children are slaves, too. Since my sons were arrested here, they were twice sold before my face. I saw them with their arms chained together, and my arms were chained, and my master's son lay in the room where I lay with a brace of pistols under his head; and when I turned over, he would start up and lay his hand on one. I know one man who gave his slave one hundred and fifty lashes in two days, and on the third he died. He crept into the field; and his master, supposing he was sleeping, went up and cowhided him, but he was cowhiding a corpse, thinking he was asleep! Such is the condition of Slavery; it is a hard substance; you cannot break it nor pull it apart, and the only way is to escape from it. I think it is the North that keeps up slavery. Such is my opinion. I am thankful to the community that has been so kind and charitable as to help me out of the scrape, and now I would like to have my sons out."

Lines,

WRITTEN FOR AND READ AT CROSBY HALL.

Hark! hark! to the sound,
Of the baying blood-hound;
And hark to the pistol shot!—
See the fugitive slave,
With a heart that is brave,
Is away from the cursed spot!

In vain they pursue—
He is far from their view,—
In vain they may hurry and chafe;
For the border at last,
Is successfully pass'd,
And the fugitive slave is safe!

But ere he can gain
The means to obtain
His bread by the sweat of his brow;
A home he requires—
Fulfil his desires,
And do it like Englishmen, NOW!

His food he will earn
By his labour; and learn
Both careful and happy to be;
And the once broken chain
Shall not bind him again,
For the fugitive slave is FREE!

Success to the man
Who has done what he can;
The WARD that has shewn us to-night;
'Tis the heart that creates,
The man in all states—
And the Black is as good as the White.

There cometh a day,
When the tyrant shall pray
In vain, with his blood-red hand;
While the fugitive slave,
Shall go up from his grave,
To a seat at the King's right hand.

The African Slave Trade.

Many people among us do not allow themselves to realize the fact that the slave-holders intend to have Congress re-open the African slave-trade—probably because they are unable to credit it. A year ago the same persons did not suppose it possible for any influence in this country to carry a repeal of the Missouri Compromise. They are always incredulous in this way, and never admit that any apprehended devilism of slavery, can succeed until its success is made certain. This class of easy, conservative citizens, without being felt anywhere as a positive force, have much influence in our politics, and they do very much to tempt and encourage slavery to be aggressive. While others work unscrupulously to arrange and carry the measures of slavery, these men do very much to discountenance and obstruct opposition.

It is true, that the slavery fanatics intend to revive the African slave trade, and that they expect to carry this measure without serious difficulty. It is advocated by various Southern papers, and by slaveholding politicians at Washington. Mr. Slidell in the Senate has already made a motion looking to the introduction of this scheme, and the demand for it among slavery propagandists constantly grows and strengthens.

The aim is to counterbalance the influence of emigration from Europe to the free States, to supply the demand for more slaves, and to increase the facilities for stocking the new Territories and transforming them into slave States. The Charleston Standard says:—

"To practice slavery and yet suppress the slave trade—to contend that slavery is of advantage to the races which concur in its existence, and yet resist the efforts by which the advantage is extended—to urge that the union of unequal races is necessary to the progress of human society, and yet resist the means by which that union is effected, is a contradiction which human ingenuity can never reconcile; and yet to such a contradiction the southern section of this country is compelled in every effort which looks to the discountenancing and discouragement of the traffic with the coast of Africa, by which the limits of this institution are extended. * * To bask in the brightening beams of such an institution as slavery, to defend it, to praise it, and pray for its continuance, and yet contribute ships and soldiers to prevent its extension and its spread to others than ourselves, is scarcely defensible upon any reasonable principle of human action."

But, say our Northern quietists,—the men who are proud of being called "Conservatives," and who gather their robes closely about them and pass by on "the other side," whenever they see an "anti-slavery fanatic,"—this is only the wild talk of Southern extremists, the madmen of slavery, it will never be countenanced; no Northern man will ever advocate a restoration of the African slave trade. And so they will feel and talk, and help on the scheme by hindering efficient opposition to it, until some day not far off in the future, the telegraph informs them that it has been driven through Congress. Now it is a fact that the Northern scoundrelism which does so much for the slave power, has already begun to advocate this revival of piracy. Look at the following from the New York Day Book:

"It is undeniable that there is, in this country, a growing disposition to withdraw the restriction on the African slave trade, and to re-open it to the enterprise of our merchants. A few years ago the proposition would have been received with a shudder, and found not one advocate in the whole Union; but the fanaticism and discussion of the Abolitionists have led a good many minds to examine the subject more closely and carefully, and it is useless to deny the fact, and there are many who think that the bringing of the wild savages of Africa to this country, and making good, industrious working men and women of them, would be an absolute blessing.

"A few months ago, we heard a most noble argument in favour of a resumption of the slave trade, from one of our most eminent citizens—a man whose sound judgment and morality no one will deny, and who has been, for more than thirty years, a consistent and leading member of the Presbyterian Church.

"The basis of this argument was, that the Africans were an inferior race; that they were the descendants of Ham, and condemned by God to slavery forever; that we, as an enlightened Christian nation, were under obligations not to send missionaries there to waste their time and strength in trying to convert a wild and barbarous people to Christianity. "We are bound," said he, "by the laws of humanity and the command of God, to take care of them, and Christianize them, and we should go about it in a practical way. Let us bring them here, work them, take care of them, and teach them the arts, civilization, and Christianity, and no longer be governed by the foolish and impracticable philanthropy that sends our own men and women to the wilds of Africa and their own graves in order to scream the name of Jesus Christ into the ears of a little negro as he runs past in search of a wild boar or a young tiger."

"No longer ago than last Thursday we heard an enthusiastic religious lady arguing in the same strain. "It is our duty," said she, "our duty to God and our fellow-creatures, to do all we can to civilize and Christianize the heathen of other lands, and how can we do it so effectually as by bringing them to our shores and taking them into our own families? We are now doing every thing for Ireland and nothing for the rest of the world. Let England take care of Ireland and the Irish, we have enough of them, and let us look to Africa. Let our ships go there and ransom their prisoners, bring them here and sell them to us for servants. It is infinitely better than to try to convert them by sending out missionaries. They make the best servants in the world, and rightly taught and instructed, they become industrious, faithful and good Christians."

"Think," she added, "of having your servants born in your own house, instructed in your own kitchen, brought up with your children and interested in your own affairs, as much as yourself, what can be more Christianlike and charitable than such a relationship? If people would set about correcting the abuses of slavery and let the institution itself alone, it would be a blessing to both the white and the black race."

Here we have the line of argument that is to be adopted by this Northern scoun- [illegible] slave trade is to be "re-opened to the enterprise of our merchants," and this, it is calculated, will produce a tremendous excitement of commercial acquisitiveness which nothing can withstand.—But this is not all. According to the Day Book, the commercial and fashionable religion of the North will be foremost in this work, on account of its "civilizing and christianizing" influence, and it is to have a mighty support from this quarter,—if those concerned in it are not mistaken.—Books have been written to prove that slavery is a great missionary institution, and that slave traders are regular missionaries of the gospel. Of course all who write such books and all who believe them, will be among the most eager to revive the African slave trade, and fit out slavers.

Other villainous schemes are already arranged and set down on the programme of the slave power, and each in turn will be supported by all the Northern organs and mercenaries of that power, when the time is ripe.—Commonwealth.

A Slave Working in a Yoke.

A correspondent of the New York Tribune, speaking of a visit to New Orleans, says:

"In passing one day through a public street, in the central part of the city, our attention was attracted by something of an unusual appearance about the neck and shoulders of a young negro man, who was busy among a number of laborers and mechanics engaged in the erection of some new buildings. It had the form of an immense yoke or collar fastened about the man's neck, projecting on each side in a most extraordinary fashion. In our simplicity we at first supposed him to be some great criminal, thus expiating his offences against violated law, but on making inquiry of a by-stander, we soon learned that he was only 'a runaway.'

"We could not be satisfied with this passing glance at such a sight, and took an early occasion to pass through the same street a second time. We had this time a nearer view of the unfortunate slave. He was mixing mortar by the sidewalk, and there was no one very near, and we ventured to stop, and, with an assumed carelessness of manner, to enter into conversation with the man. He was physically a noble specimen of the human race, though his skin was black as ebony. Large and well proportioned in body and limbs, with well developed, brawny muscles, and alert, vigorous movements, he exhibited also, in the keen glances of a dark and piercing eye, and in his bold and fearless front, the unmistakable proofs of a daring and untamed spirit. A bar of solid iron, about two inches in width, of proportionate thickness, was bent in the middle in a semi-circle, with a straight projection about six inches long on each side, in such a manner that when fastened to another similiar piece the two together formed a complete circle or collar for the man's neck, with the double bar projecting outward horizontally on either side. The two, when fitted and fastened upon his neck, presented a most barbarous and revolting spectacle, forming an immense clamp or shackle, extending from side to side, the whole length of his ample shoulders, about eighteen inches, and weighing about fifteen pounds!

"Pray, how would you fancy it, honest reader, you we mean, who live by hard work, to carry such a neat ornament of rough black iron as that around your neck while you mixed up the mortar the livelong day in the dusty street, or tugged up the long ladders in the burning sun with a hod of bricks? Ah, Dennis! you have a heart that can feel, if one could only know where to touch you! And you, too, Murphy! And you, Patrick! And you know it is too bad to use a poor working man in that way, all because the Almighty gave him a black skin!"

"The very dray horse is relieved from his harness at night, and the sturdy ox is loosened from his yoke. But no friendly hand removes the iron yoke of this hapless man. At a blacksmith's anvil, with heavy sledge-hammers were driven in and firmly fastened the strong rivets which hold together the two ponderous bars of that diabolical contrivance which some infernal fiend, fresh from the lowest abyss of the pit of hell, suggested to the mind of the vindictive wretch who pretends to be the owner of his fellow-man! For three whole years, beginning when he was but eighteen years old, the unhappy youth, had worn this cruel yoke by day and by night!"

ESCAPE OF A FUGITIVE SLAVE.—A colored man, who called himself Chas. Shadrack, and who has resided in Boston about fourteen years, six of which he has worked in the kitchen of Gibb's Hotel, Court Square, ascertained a day or two since that his former owner was in town, making particular inquiries respecting him. He took passage in the Admiral yesterday morning for St. John, thinking that the air of the British provinces would be more congenial at this season of the year than the variable climate of Boston.—Boston Herald.

Our Tour.

CHATHAM, July 23, 1854.

DEAR FRIENDS,—True to promise, I send herewith the anecdote given by the Indian "friend," related at the Dawn meeting, as applicable at least in the mind of the narrator to the colored people, and those officious persons known to them, who under pretence of concern for their welfare, though really actuated by "personal," and other selfish "considerations," insinuate themselves among them to array them against one another, and ultimately make them effect their ruin by their own hands. The Indian addressed the assembly in these words:—

"Coloured people! I am Indian! I came from Muncey Town! I listen to this man, (Mr. Scoble), and this woman, and I tell you something about the muscalange and the mullet, two fishes; they live in the water; and a four-legged thing. The four-legged thing come to the water's edge one day, and he said, "Muscalange, mullet say something about you." Muscalange get very angry, and said, "I kill that mullet!" He sees mullet, and say to him, "Mullet, muscalange is going to kill you,"—mullet get angry, and they both meet at the water's edge and fight. The four-legged thing stand off looking on. They kill each other, when the four-legged thing say, "Ha! ha! I got my dinner!"

He then proceeded to explain that the fishes were the people and your servant respectively—the people being represented by the muscalange, and the woman by the mullet; the four-legged thing by the "white friend" present. Storms of merriment and applause accompanied the story, which came home to all present, as true to life in so many of their experiences.

The next evening I went with some friends to the Chatham Settlement. (Mr. Peter B. Smith's.) There was a fine gathering of the farmers of the neighbourhood in the school-house, and the "spirit" of the meeting was of the right kind. Mr. Smith was chairman for the evening, and resolutions in favour of the Paper, the Provincial Union, and a Tea Meeting, were passed unanimously.

The school at this Settlement, as well as the one at Dawn, is taught by a female, and Miss Miner's stereotyped expression of the pupils attending her Colonization School at Washington, was truly applicable to the pupils seen in the Dawn schools; for such "bright and happy faces" are seldom seen; a circumstance, certainly in favour of the kind efforts of the teachers.

LONDON, July 25.

Attended the meeting held by the voters, last night, at Chatham, at which I saw quite a large number of females. I like that new feature in political gatherings, and you will agree with me, that much of the asperity of such assemblies will be softened by their presence.

The candidates spoken of, were McKellar and Waddell, and such a scanning as their canvassers got, will not soon be forgotten by them. The coloured people know in what their interests and the true interests of the country consist. After the meeting, I was kindly permitted to say a word of the paper, after which cordial remarks of approval were made of the Freeman, and as at Dawn, there was a strong aye for the Paper, Union, and a Tea Meeting. To-night there is to be a gathering at Horton Street Baptist Chapel, for the same objects.

Your obedient servant,
M. A. SHADD,

James D. Tinsley.

It is with no ordinary feelings, that we take up our pen to write a word by way of respectful tribute, to the lamented friend whose name stands at the head of this article. It was our pleasure to be with him during the whole of the time he was in London, and, indeed, almost every day, from his arrival to his departure. We thus saw more of him than did any other human being, during his sojourn here, and alas! during the last of his days on the earth.—This fact, imposes upon us the melancholy duty, alike to the public, and to the family of the deceased, to say a few words touching him.

Mr. Tinsley left Toronto for Australia, on the 31st day of July, 1852. He arrived at Liverpool, from Australia, on the steamer Great Britain, about the middle of February, 1854. To our joyful surprise, we met him in London, on the 18th of that month. Like two brothers, who had been separated by long time, and immense distance, we both felt as if neither could see too much of the other. Accordingly, we rode, walked, dined, supped, worshipped and visited together, daily, from the 17th till the 24th, when we parted; we to resume our labour in England, and he to return to Canada, to the bosom of his family, and to bear precious messages to our family. How little did either of us know of the future!

Intending to take a Cunard steamer for Boston, our friend left London on Friday, the 24th, to embark at Liverpool on the 25th. But for some reason not known to us, he remained till the first day of March, and sailed in the City of Glasgow, whose fate is not to be revealed till the day when the "sea shall give up its dead."

We mourn for him as for a lost brother. We bewail him as one would his own mother's son. It never was our lot to enjoy the real, true friendship of but very few individuals, and Mr. Tinsley was one of that small number. There were but few who so well understood us as he, and the last few days we were together, our love for each other increased and ripened, until our two hearts were united together like the hearts of David and Jonathan. Hence, our power to sympathize and condole with the afflicted family of our friend.

It will be seen that Mr. Tinsley's sojourn in Australia was short. He went there to accomplish certain business objects; he succeeded; he left, and was returning, like a true husband, a fond father, a dutiful son, but, the veil of ocean's depths till the morning of the Resurrection. It is not a little consoling, however, to know that while in Australia, (that wild land of reckless adventure, and strong, and in too many cases, overpowering temptations,) he not only maintained his integrity, as a man and a Christian, but he did more. He endeared himself to an affectionate circle of Christian friends, in a manner that did honour to himself and his people. Distant from home and friends, tossed on the ocean billow, exposed to the more boisterous waves of human passion, his bosom was calm and his heart peaceful, because he felt and enjoyed the nearness of his Saviour. The simple earnestness of his religion, the child-like strength and fulness of his faith, never forsook him, but always distinguished him as a man of no ordinary moral and religious character.—Gentle in heart, simple in manners, modest in deportment, cheerful in social intercourse, and abundant in intelligence and self-respect, he won friends and retained them wherever he went in either hemisphere. And when these happy and brilliant natural qualities were sustained, fortified, chastened, ennobled and beautified, by the power of the Holy Spirit, they made their possessor a rich and rare ornament to any social circle, which was so fortunate as to have him for one of its members.

"Doth cover him from every eye,"

Hence is it, that returning from Australia, after so limited a residence there, Mr. Tinsley brought with him testimonials of character, and Christian usefulness, of which any Briton might well be proud, and which were certain and successful passports into society in London, to which but few of any colour or country, ever attain. Among these, were letters of introduction to some of the first literary and scientific gentlemen of London; to the Secretary of the Young Mens' Christian Association of the British Metropolis, from the Secretary of a kindred Society in Melbourne; from the pastor of the Baptist Church in Melbourne; and from the Superintendent and Teachers of the Melbourne Baptist Sabbath School, in which Mr. T., was an honoured, useful and beloved teacher—though there was not a black or coloured person in the school. Wishing for the honour of introducing our beloved brother to some of our London acquaintances, and enjoying that honour, we found that his letters to our great joy and satisfaction, but not at all to our surprise, enabled him to introduce us to several persons whom it was our pride and privilege thus to know, through the kindness of Mr. Tinsley.

Had he lived, Mr. Tinsley would have continued to be, what he was, an example to young men, a hope of old men, a patriotic citizen, a dutiful subject, an exemplary Christian. Why he should be taken from his family, when about to enjoy the power and the pleasure of making them independent,—why the fond hopes of one of the best of fathers, should so soon be blasted, touching the earthly career of his most useful, if not his favourite son,—why our young men should so unexpectedly lose one so earnestly devoted to their improvement—why the cause of the British negro should suffer such an untimely loss,—why the Church should thus be deprived of one of her brightest ornaments in a manner so affecting, so awful, so deplorable—that no dying word, no parting glance, no note of his departure, should be given us;—all this is known to Him who doeth all things well; and by whom all things are made to work together, for good for them that love God. In His bosom rests this day, doubtless, that which is more than mortal, in our beloved, departed friend, James D. Tinsley. May he, his family, and we, all meet at God's right hand, to part no more forever! Amen.

S. R. W.

The 1st of August in Toronto.

The celebration held in this city, on Tuesday last, was one of which every one may well be proud. It is the opinion of the citizens generally, that a more orderly, harmonious, and better disposed body of persons never met together here on a similiar occasion. The greatest good feeling was displayed throughout, and the most untiring efforts were made by the Committee appointed, to give satisfaction to the large body of citizens and strangers who participated in the festivities of the day.

The order of proceedings were very similiar to the announcement of them previously made, and which we here repeat.

A Prayer-Meeting was held, at 5 a. m., in the Sayer Street Chapel; and, at a later hour, a procession was formed, marshalled by Messrs. W. H. Harris, C. P. Lucas, and W. Thompson. About 10 o'clock the Arabian arrived with the Hamiltonians. After some delay, on account of rain, the Odd-Fellows, with some of the citizens, preceded by Scott's Brass Band, proceeded from the Government Grounds to Browne's wharf to meet them, led by W. H. Harris, the Marshal of the Day, at which place the following short Address was delivered by T. Smallwood, Senr., President of the Day:—

FELLOW-SUBJECTS OF THIS NOBLE PROVINCE, AND CITIZENS OF HAMILTON,—It is my pleasing duty, in behalf of a portion of my fellow-citizens of Toronto, to welcome you, who have honoured us this day with your presence, to partake of a festival in commemoration of one among the greatest events in British history, when that magnanimous nation swept the bonds from 800,000 bondsmen, and made them free. Though some narrow-minded individuals object, saying, because we did not achieve it ourselves, it is disgraceful for us to celebrate this day; I am assured by your presence here to-day, that I speak your sentiments, when I say that I envy not the narrowness of the mind that can entertain such disloyal sentiments: so you are therefore heartily welcome to our hospitality.

The company then repaired to the Cathedral, together with a numerous body of citizens, where a sermon was preached by the Rev. Mr. Grassett, and at 12 o'clock the entire body formed and paraded through the principal streets to the Government Grounds, and partook of a sumptuous Dinner. After dinner, the President called the assembly to order, and, in a pertinent, but brief speech, stated the object for which they were assembled. Three cheers were then given for Her Majesty the Queen; after which, G. Dupont Wells, Esq., was solicited by the President to read the Address to the Queen, when a hearty expression of good feeling for Mr Wells was given by three cheers.

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

To Her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

WE, the Coloured Inhabitants of Canada, most respectfully, most gratefully and most loyally approach your Gracious Majesty, on this, the anniversary of our death to Slavery, and our birth to Freedom. With what feelings, or what words can we adequately express our gratitude to England for such a boon?

Our hearts are wholly your Majesty's; and if the time should ever come when your Majesty might need our aid, our lives would be as they are, at your service.

What a happy, what a proud reflection it must be to your Majesty, to know that the moment the poor crushed slave sets foot upon any part of your mighty dominions, his chains fall from him,—he feels himself a man, and can look up. Can it be conceived that he would not on that same spot turn, and whilst defending the hallowed soil, that memory would not fire his brain, and gratitude nerve his arm! Can your Majesty imagine that from such a people, loyalty could be an empty name, or devotion be a dream!

Faults of commission may be urged against us by those who grudge us our Freedom; but we carefully watch that such faults shall be the exception and not the rule; at the same time, we pray your Majesty in your judgment of us, to remember that whilst the invigorating food of education was jealously withheld from us, the brutalizing cup of Slavery was forced between our lips until we drained it to the very dregs.

The effects, more or less, must have been a moral stupor, for which the hand of time and kindness can alone provide the cure.—But amid all our trials, we beg your Gracious Majesty to believe we yet thank the Most High that he has granted us the privilege of teaching our little ones to join us in praying that the God of battle may give victory to your Majesty's arms—that He will continue to bless your Majesty as a Queen, bless you as a wife, bless you as a mother; and that it will please Him in his infinite wisdom and mercy, long "to put back the time" of removing you from your Earthly to your Heavenly crown.

And as in duty bound,
We will ever pray.

Toronto, Canada Wes }
August 1st, 1854. }

At the conclusion of the reading, it was unanimously adopted by the citizens of Toronto, after a motion to that effect, and seconded by the citizens of Hamilton; and after speeches made by Mr. Harris, of Toronto, and others, the accompanying Toasts and Resolution followed:

1. "The Queen".—Three cheers.

2. "The Army and Navy of Great Britain."—Three cheers.

3. "The Governor General."—Three cheers.

4. "The Provincial Freeman."—Remarks by the President, and three cheers.

Mr. Blue, President of the Hamilton Delegation, then followed in a neat speech.

5. Three cheers for the Toronto and Hamilton Bands.

6. Resolved, That we celebrate the 1st of August, 1855, at Hamilton.

7. Concluding toast—"Our Wives and Sweethearts."

The procession formed again, and proceeded to the room of the newly-organized Society of Odd-Fellows. In the evening, a Soiree was held in the same grounds; and after tea, a grand display of fire-works was made, which last gratification was mainly due to the exertions of Mr. G. Carter, who certainly deserves great credit for endeavors made in connection with the male and female members of the Committees, to have everything pass off pleasantly.

The U. S. National Council.

The meeting of the National Council, recently held in Cleveland, was singularly inharmonious. Although Frederick Douglass, A. G. Beeman, and other stars were present; they seem to have paled before the light of DAY. Wm. H. Day and others,—representatives of the practical workers among colored Americans, could not be persuaded into the harness, so the Industrial School, with the et celeras will be allowed to rest for a time. There was a measure of common sense shown by Mr. Day and his supporters at that meeting that will commend itself to the colored people of the States, we believe. The people know full well that their deliverance is not to be effected by Rochester conventions, National Councils, Colored Industrial Schools, nor any of the many schemes originating in the fertile brains of their leaders; and it is well for them that their cause can be entrusted to one on such critical occasions, who, though a David in years and prowess, to the Goliaths here and there amongst them, is, nevertheless, armed to the teeth with the Saxon's best weapons,—learning and conscience. Well, there was a great sounding of trumpets, and the council walls fell, although a sort of adhesive plaster was applied to the breach. When the battle was in Rochester, Ohio was despised, and with her all the world except New York; but now, that the field of operations is Ohio, the people's wishes are respected, and Rochester is of course disturbed. May the people work by Day!

It will be seen by the following that George H. Wright, of this city, was subjected to annoyance while on a boat plying between this city and Hamilton lately. We seldom hear of conduct so contemptible outside of Yankeedom, and hope for the credit of this country, that it may everywhere be treated with the severity it deserves:

MEAN.—Mr. G. H. Wright, a young colored man of this city, complains that while on a trip to Hamilton in the steamer Queen City, the Captain would not allow him to have a seat at the brea fast table, although he tendered the cabin fare. Mr. Wright is well known in the city as a young man of moral worth, and respected by many of the wealthy and influential, and we think, although his skin is a little dark, he did not merit such treatment, so unusual on this side of the lake. There is as much and more of the real gentleman about him, than those who are so very refined.—North American.

☞ We take great pleasure in announcing, as requested, that the name of the Rev. J. B. Smith, will no longer be on the list of contributors to this paper.

Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

MR. FREEMAN,—I hope you will give a more correct account of the proceedings of the 1st inst., than did the Colonist of this city. I did think it an unintentional mistake, but having sent a correction of it to that paper, for publication, and it not having done so, I am led to believe that the Colonist is again at its old tricks; giving the coloured people a one-sided thrust, when opportunity affords. I had hoped there was a decided improvement in that paper, with regard to the matter; but I fear from its last exhibition toward the colored people, I am doomed to disappointment.

Yours, respectfully,
THOS. SMALLWOOD.

RETURN OF INTERMENTS.—The Board of Health not being able to furnish us with any reliable statistics of the present mortality in the city, we procured yesterday the following returns from the various cemeteries, which will be found to exhibit a comparative view of the number of deaths during the present month, and the corresponding period of last year.

INTERMENTS FROM 1ST JULY TO 27TH JULY, 1853.

St. Paul's Cemetery,	17
Necropolis,	10
Potter's Field,	24
St. James' Cemetery,	22
	73

INTERMENTS FROM 1ST JULY TO 27TH JULY, 1854.

St. Paul's Cemetery,	85
Necropolis,	23
Potter's Field,	144
St. James' Cemetery,	90
	342
Interments from 1st to 27th July, '53	73
Increase	269

It will be seen, from the above, that the mortality since the commencement of the present month, has been about five times the average rate. There is nothing in this fact to create undue alarm, but it is as well that it should be stated, in order that the public may see the necessity of using every precaution, in regard to diet, cleanliness, &c., so long as the seeds of disease are abroad in the atmosphere to a more than usual extent. The following are the number of interments during the present week.

Monday,	21
Tuesday,	29
Wednesday,	31
Thursday,	31

This shows a very remarkable increase on last week, the average then being about twelve a day, while now it is twenty-eight. We believe that the excitement and intemperance attending on the election are partly the causes of the increase.—Globe of Saturday, July 29th.

We deeply regret to state that a melancholy and fatal accident occurred on the bay before this city yesterday, whereby four of our citizens, named D. Miller, boat-builder; two Dunlops—father and son— and —— Stephens, were hurried into eternity.

We have been given to understand that the accident was partly caused by an overheavy main-sail, the bilge of which, with the bows of the boat, were forced under water by the blast, the boat having then immediately filled, went down.—Old Countryman.

☞ From a Proclamation which appears in the Canada Gazette, we learn that the Act passed in June of last year, to regulate the currency of this Province, comes into effect on the 1st of August next. By it the dollar is to be 5s. of our present currency, and the cent one-hundreth of a dollar, and the mill one-tenth of a cent. Accounts may be kept, and persons may sue or be sued, or all business transactions in either denomination of currency shall be legal.

WHEAT CROP OF CANADA.—We learn from a gentleman who has traversed Canada, from London to Montreal, and visited much of the interior, that the wheat crop of Upper Canada will far exceed that of any other year in its amount. It is estimated that a third more was sown last year, than the year before, and it all looks flourishing. The surplus last year is estimated at 7,000,000 bushels. This year it is calculated the surplus will reach 12,000,000 bushels. Estimating the price at only $1.50 per bushel, it gives the farmers $18,000,000 for wheat alone for a foreign market.

On Sabbath last, W. Keogh, a shoemaker, residing on the corner of Queen and Sumach streets, was arrested by the police on suspicion of having murdered his wife, whose throat was cut from ear to ear. After the commission of the deed he ran into the street shouting that his wife had destroyed herself. Keogh attributes the fatal deed to drunkenness, yet denies that he committed the murder.

NEW GOVERNOR GENERAL.—We are in receipt of a private letter from St. Johns, New Brunswick, stating that Sir Edmund Head has received the appointment of Governor General of British North America, and that His Excellency will leave for Quebec immediately on the arrival from England of his successor, the Honorable John Henry Thomas Manners Suttan.—Quebec Mercury, July 24.

United States.

Crime of Mr. Smith.

Statement of a passenger by the Prometheus published in the New York Tribune, May 26th:

As the steamer Routh, of the Transit Company of New York, was approaching Greytown, two boats or bungos were perceived tied close to the beach. The owner of these boats, perceiving that the steamer was nearing him, cried out to the captain of the steamer to take care, and not run into him. At this time the owner of the boats had a gun in his hand. The steamer passed on, but returned again, and it was suggested by an influential person on board that such should be done, with the object of giving the unfortunate man fifty lashes for his imprudence. Instead of doing so, however, the captain of the iron steamer Routh called for his rifle, and taking deliberate aim at the man, shot him dead—the ball passing through his heart.

Upon the arrival of the Routh at Greytown, the authorities proceeded on board the ocean steamer to arrest Captain Smith for the murder of this native. The American Minister, who happened to be upon the spot, called upon the passengers present to prevent the arrest, and was successful for the time. Later in the evening Mr. Borland, the American minister, went on shore and proceeded to the residence of the United States Commercial Agent at that port. The populace, enraged at what had occurred, surrounded the house and used threatening language to Mr. Borland for his interference in behalf of Captain Smith, the master of the boat, and a Portuguese by birth.

NEW YORK, July 25th.

The Prometheus, which arrived last night reports that Greytown was bombarded by a U. S. Sloop of war. Cyane was afterwards set on fire and destroyed; this was done because the authorities would not make apology for insult to Mr. Borland.

Three English vessels witnessed the bombardment, but offered no assistance. No lives were lost, nor did the inhabitants repel the attack in any way whatever.

Crime at Washington.

A Mrs. Ann Benner has made complaint before Justice Smith of an outrage committed on her almost unparalleled in the annals of brutality. It appears that the lady, aged over forty years, and her husband, a poor old man, were offered premises in the Slashes by a benevolent gentleman free of rent. On Wednesday afternoon the aged couple went to see the house, and while there, it is stated that three young men drove up, said the property was theirs, got the old man and his wife into the vehicle and drove off with them. They had not got far into the woods however, beyond Boundary and Fourteenth Streets, when they put the old man out, and drove into a secluded recess, where each of the young men violated her person, acting more like devils than even brutes, the details of which are totally unfit for publication. Two young men have been arrested named George Fausnaught and Wm. Moore, and were fully committed by Justice Smith. The other fellow has not yet been caught, but he cannot well escape. Among the number of brutal acts recently reported in the midst, where such crimes are becoming fearfully on the increase, this is the most horrible.—Evening Star.

A DO-NOTHING CONGRESS,—The Courier & Enquirer thus happily hits the character of the present Congress:

"Congress makes its business to do Nothing, and this business is now 'thoroughly disposed of.' What did it do yesterday? Nothing. The day before? Nothing. The day before that? Nothing. Last week? Nothing, except make Nothing of the Know Nothing. Week before last? Nothing Last month? Nothing, but buy lands of Mexico where Nothing grows. Month before last? Nothing but turn the Missouri Compromise into Nothing. The month before that? Nothing, but talk Nothing. The month before that? Nothing whatever!"

BERIEN COUNTY.—This has been one of the finest weeks for the farmers imaginable. The weather cool and delightful. Most of the crop has been cut and shocked. Another such a week and our farmers will have secured the greatest grain crop ever grown in this valley.—Niles Republican.

GENESEE COUNTY.—Our farmers are now in the midst of their wheat harvest, and a better yield they never had. The straw is as heavy as can cover the round, the head of the grain is long and well filled, and the berry plump and large. Some pieces will yield as high as fifty bushels to the acre.—Democrat.

THE RUNAWAY.—In our paper of Sunday morning, we alluded to the fact of an overseer from a plantation in Prince George's county, Maryland, coming into the city in pursuit of a fugitive, and of the latter escaping from the former, and voluntarily returning the next morning to the jail of this county. The runaway had been handcuffed, and tied by the legs on the horse, behind the overseer, but he purposely slipped off, when a fight occurred between the parties, the white man undergoing a choking process, and the negro receiving two stabs in the back. The rope which bound the slave's legs were cut by the overseer, on condition that he would loosen the grasp on his throat. The flight of the slave was the consequence. Last accounts represent the overseer at home, suffering from the effects of the contest. The negro is still in jail, awaiting the requisition of his master. Having repeated the suspicion that the overseer had been killed, it is but due we should now state that the apprehension was ill-founded.—Washington Sentinel.

FREE MEDICAL COLLEGE.—The State of Michigan has the honour of being the first State in the Union, if not in the world, which offers to the student from all portions of America, a complete Collegiate Course of Medical instruction free of charge. The College is in Ann Arbor, where seven Professors are on duty, and the course of studies are said to be complete and thorough; the term commencing on the first of October, and continuing six months.—Free Democrat.

DREADFUL CASUALTY.—One of the circumstances of criminal carelessness that shock every right-minded person, occurred at the town of New Boston, in Clermont county, on Sunday afternoon. Andrew Patterson, a young man twenty years of age, out of wanton mischief, pointed a loaded shot gun at his widowed mother, not believing it to be loaded, pulled the trigger, and the contents lodged in the face of his mother, completely tearing away the whole of the lower jaw, and a greater portion of the tongue. Skilful treatment had been applied, and by our last advices she was still alive, but the wound was one of the most dreadful character.—Albany Register.

John Pitit, who has a seat in the United States Senate, from Indiana, declared a few days since that the declaration that all men are created equal, "was a self-evident lie!"

A Simple Remedy.

A correspondent of the Missouri Democrat gives the following as a simple remedy for the cholera, which he seems to say has been tried with success. He says:

If you drink about a wine glass full of weak lye-water, made from wood ashes, you will have no cholera. It should not be too strong, but palatable.

To steamboat captains—Gentlemen, you have it in your power to prevent much sickness, by resorting to this simple remedy of lye-water, made from wood ashes; it being a certain preventative of cholera. Whenever it makes its appearance on your boats, remove from your table your beans, hominy and pickle; give your passengers good wholesome food. Put in in your water jar sufficient ashes to make a weak lye. Let all of them drink from it regularly, and my word for it the cholera will cease and the passengers be healthy.

The writer refers all those who doubt the efficacy of the above remedy to Capt. W. Eads, former captain of the steamer Robert Campbell. This remedy is within reach of every one who is desirous of being healthy.

The German powers now prononnce it as their opinion that the propositions contained in the Russian answer, if not altogether satisfactory, appear calculated to serve as a basis for future negotiations, and they propose that Prague shall be fixed upon as the seat of further negotiations. They moreover express their opinion that it will not be possible to call upon the Emperor Nicholas to evacuate the Principalities, if it be not at the same time clearly understood that the Allied Powers shall stop their movements in advance. In other words, Austria has fallen back into alliance with Russia. The Austrian reserves are to be called out and placed on a war footing.

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT.—A very melancholy accident from sea-bathing occurred at Kincraig, near Fife, resulting in the death of two young ladies. Misses Isabel and Mary Russel, had gone down together to the beach—the latter with the intention of bathing, her sister accompanying her. The place they selected being betwixt two ridges of rock, and the time being high water with a considerable swell, it is supposed Miss Mary had mistaken the ground, which suddenly dips into deep water, or had been drawn out by the current, and her sister seeing her danger had gone to her rescue, when both being beyond their depths, and unable to reach the shallow water, they perished together within an hour after.

JERSEY, ENGLAND.—Mrs. Theobald, of Leicester, has laboured here about three weeks delivering about a dozen addresses, and drawing large audiences, in various parts of the Island. Her powerful advocacy has revived the cause in one of our country districts where it had been at low ebb. Many signatures have been obtained.

JOHN LINES was convicted, at Middlesex Sessions, on Wednesday, of thrusting his wife on a fire, and burning one of her legs. It appeared in the course of the trial that the wife is a very bad woman, while Lines is an industrious man; and the lenient sentence of six weeks imprisonment was passed on him.

OBSERVANCE OF SUNDAY IN FRANCE.—The Moniteur of Tuesday contains the following:—"Some persons have attributed to the Government an active interference with respect to the question of keeping the Sunday as a Sabbath. Never has the Government had this thought; it desires that the religious law should be observed; it sets everywhere the example; but it neither wishes nor ought to do more; that is for every one a free conscience, which admits neither constraint nor intimidation."

THE NEW COSTUME FOR THE TROOPS.—We understand that the new clothing for the British army is to be as follows:—A wide or easy-fitting frock coat, "that a soldier might move in" loose trousers, of a dark colour, for all seasons; a soft, elastic stock, and a light, low-crowed shako. It is said that the Grenadiers' caps and the Highlanders' plumes are to be totally done away with.

PROPOSED SUNDAY OPENING OF THE CRYSTAL PALACE.—The Literary Gazette, in republishing Mr. E. Baines's letter to Mr. Oliveira, M. P., gives the following testimony as to the effect of opening Kew Gardens (which was lately done by Sir Wm. Molesworth) and Hampton Court Palace on the Sunday:—"We have not objected to the opening of Kew Gardens on Sundays, and yet the business which is going on, during this season, at the different stations on this line of Railway, is very much greater on Sundays than on any day of the week. There are no less than ninety-three trains of pleasure traffic, forty-two down trains and fifty-one up trains, on the Windsor line of railway every Sunday. And the attractions of such places as Hambton Court and the neighbouring public-houses, lead many into excesses, on Sundays, that would never otherwise be indulged in. Notwithstanding the many thousands who visit this place every Sunday, by another railway, many still travel to it in vans, often returning as we ourselves too often witness, full of mirth and revelry. The excitement of the Crystal Palace and its shows is too great for Sabbath relaxation."

The Emperor and Empress of the French, it is stated, will meet Queen Victoria and Prince Albert in the Downs shortly, on board the Hannibal.

Wild Flowers.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

Beautiful children of the woods and fields!
That bloom by mountain streamlets 'mid the heather,
Or into clusters 'neath the hazels gather—
Or where by hoary rocks you make your fields,
And sweetly flourish on through summer weather—
I love ye all!

Beautiful flowers! to me ye fresher seem
From the Almighty hand that fashioned all,
Than those that flourish by a garden-wall,
And I can image you, as in a dream,
Fair, modest maidens, raised in hamlets small,
I love ye all!

Beautiful gems! that on the brow of earth
Are fixed as in a queenly diadem:
Though lowly ye, and most without a name,
Young hearts rejoice to see your buds come forth,
As light erewhile into the world came—
I love ye all!

Beautiful things ye are, where'er ye grow!
The wild red-rose the speedwell's peeping eyes
Our own blue bell—the daisy, that doth rise
Wherever sunbeams fall or winds do blow;
And thousands more, of blessed forms and dyes,
I love ye all!

Beautiful nurslings of the early dew,
Fanned in your loveliness by every breeze.
And shade I o'er by green and arching trees:
I often wished that I were one of you,
Dwelling afar upon the grassy leas—
I love ye all.

Beautiful children of the glen and dell—
The dingle deep—the moorland stretching wide,
And of the mossy fountain's sedgy side!
Ye o'er my heart have thrown a lovesome spell;
And though the worldling, scorning, may deride,
I love ye all!

Selections.

NEWSPAPERS.—A man eats up a pound of sugar and the pleasure he has enjoyed is ended; but the information he gets from a newspaper is treasured up in the mind to be used whenever occasion or inclination calls for it. A newspaper is not the wisdom of one man or two men; it is the wisdom of the age—of past ages too. A family without a newspaper is always half an age behind the times in general information; besides, they never think much nor find much to think about. And there are the little ones growing up in ignorance, without a taste for reading. Besides all these evils, there's the wife, who, when her work is done, has to sit down with her hands in her lap, and nothing to amuse her mind from the toils and cares of the domestic circle. Who would be without a newspaper?—Franklin.

INTEMPERANCE.—There is no better or more forcible description of intemperance, than that given by St. Augustine, who calls it, "A distemper of the head; a subversion of the senses; a tempest of the tongue; a storm in the body; a shipwreck of virtue; a loss of time; a wilful madness; a pleasant devil; a sugared poison; a sweet sin; which he that has it, hath not himself, and he that commits it, doth not only commit sin, but he himself is altogether sin."

"Intemperance has been aptly called," saith Flavel, "the devil's bridle, by which he turneth sinners which way he pleases; he that is overcome by it can overcome no other sin."

Among the heathen he was counted the best man who spent more oil in the lamp than wine in the bottle.

LIQUID INDIA-RUBBER.—A correspondent of a New-York paper, writing from Para, in Brazil, says: "There is a method in preparing the gum which has recently been patented, and which differs essentially from the usual curdling. The milk, as drawn from the tree, is put into large glass bottles and demijohns; a preparation of a chemical nature, which is a secret, is mixed with the milk, and the bottles are securely sealed. In this way the gum is sent to the United States. It curdles twenty-four hours after exposure to the air, and forms a pure, white, solid, and remarkably strong rubber. There is only one house in Para which has the secret of this receipt, as I learn, and a member of the firm gives his personal attention to the preparation of the article, some thousands of miles in the interior of the country."

Under the Moors the population of Spain was thirty millions; it is now fifteen millions. When Granada was conquered, in 1487, it was defended by walls flanked by 1,030 towers.—The kingdom, of which it was the capital, was seventy leagues long by thirty broad, and possessed thirty-two cities of the first rank, and ninety-seven of the second. Granada, before its fall in 1487, contained 400,000 inhabitants, of whom 60,000 bore arms; it now contains but 60,000 souls, all counted. The population of the whole kingdom of Granada was three millions. Malaga, in the seventeenth century, contained 80,000 inhabitants; it now possesses only 50,000. Medina del Campo, in the seventeenth century, contained 60,000 inhabitants; it now contains 6,000. Merida, at the same epoch, possessed 40,000 inhabitants, it now possesses only 5,000. In the sixteenth century, the diocese of Salamancha had one hundred and twenty-seven cities and villages; it now has thirteen only. Segoria, in 1725, had 5,000 families; now 2,000. Seville, in the seventeenth century, had a population of 300,000, of which 130,000 were employed in manufactures; it now contains 96,000 souls, all told. Toledo, in the fifteenth century, had 200,000 inhabitants; it now has 15,000. Valence, which in the year 1600 counted a population of 600,000, now hardly numbers 60,000. In 1778 there were counted 1,511 abandoned villages in Spain, and the number has been increasing from that time to his.

ANTICIPATORY USE OF THE CROSS.—It is strange, yet well authenticated, and has given rise to many theories, that the symbol of the Cross was already known to the Indians before the arrival of Cortez. In the island of Cozumel, near Yucatan, there were several; and in Yucatan itself there was a stone cross. And there an Indian, considered a prophet among his countrymen, had declared that a nation bearing the same as a symbol should arrive from a distant country! More extraordinary still was a temple, dedicated to the Holy Cross by the Toltec nation in the city of Cholula. Near Tulansingo there is also a cross engraved on a rock with various characters, which the Indians by tradition ascribe to the Apostle St. Thomas. In Oajaca, also, there existed a cross which the Indians from time immemorial had been accustomed to consider as a divine symbol. By order of the Bishop Cervantes, it was placed in a sumptuous chapel in the cathedral. Information concerning its discovery, together with a small cup, cut out of its wood, was sent to Rome to Paul V; who received it on his knees, singing the hymn "Vexilla regis," &c.—Life in Mexico, by Madame Calderon de la Barca.

WHAT IS SALERATUS?—Wood is burnt to ashes. Ashes are lixiviated—lye is the result. Lye is evaporated by boiling—black salts are the residium. The salts undergo a purification by fire, and the potash of commerce is obtained. By another process, we change the potash into pearlash. Now put this into sacks and place them over a distillery wash-tub where the fermentation evolves carbonic acid gas, and the pearlash absorbs and renders it solid, the product being heavier, dryer and whiter, than the pearlash. It is now saleratus. How much salts of lye and carbonic acid can a human stomach bear and remain healthy, is a question for the saleratus eaters.

THE ANCIENT GIANTS OF FINLAND.—Before the French—so runs the Legend—there were the giants; a good while before, we should think, by the account the Fins give of their departure. The Finnish tradition declares—A giant child came one day to her giantness mamma, and showed her a curious insect she held in her apron, and had picked up on the plain. It was a plough, with team and driver. "Alas! my child," said mamma, "this is is a token of grief to us. Where this thing appears—small as it looks—we of the old race cannot long abide." And so it proved; and so we may form some near guess as to when the Finnish giants went away. For their legacy—so runs the legend—they left the immeasurable masses of ore which were their prodigiously hot ovens and stoves, but which are known to the tiny race of their successors as inexhaustible iron mines. They left, the people say, such an interior warmth in that particular tract of soil that corn grows and ripens during the short summer, several degrees north of the points, in Siberia and Canada, where no ear is formed. The flax is the finest known in the world; and even the modern potato ripens in the hoarded warmth of those ancient fires. The monstrous salmon that comes wedge-like up the clear frothing rivers, were the minnows with which those giants angled for the marine monsters that roll and tumble in the Arctic Seas. The wild swans were their little singing birds; and, if the swan note be now held discordant, it is through its grief for the departed patrons, and tales are told of the sweetness of that music when heard far away over the boundless swamp, accompanied by the lyre accompaniment of miles of pine forest swept by the high breeze.

PERUSING OLD PAPERS.—How depressing is the overlooking old papers long locked up, and filed away, written many years ago, when the world was brighter and friends were more numerous than now, before misfortune had dimmed the one, or death had snatched away the other? Nor are one's spirits made more cheerful, when some old document or letter transports us backward to a season of bereavement or sad mischance. The sunshine of the present is clouded by these reminiscences which produce in all their gloom the shadows of a former day. But when it happens, as is most commonly the fact, that a day of darkness and storm is selected for this melancholy review of past scenes, the sombre skies above us mingle their weeping with the tears of revived afflictions, and then a pall of darkest hue settles upon the mind. Beware of this; let no one unlock the trunk of old papers, especially such as concerns the heart, except in a cloudless day, with the sun shining in meridian splendor.

Professor Stoddard, in a lecture recently delivered upon the hurricane in Knox county, Illinois, says:—"The trunk of one of the trees blown down was about three feet in diameter. Assuming, however, its diameter to be but two and a half feet, a force of 157,000 pounds would be required to break it. The surface of the tree expanded to the action of the wind was about one thousand feet, which would give a pressure by the wind of one hundred and forty-seven pounds per square foot, which is nearly one-fourth the initial velocity of a cannon ball. Allowing the height of the hurricane or whirlwind, to have been sixty feet, the whole force exerted at one time along its track was five thousand million pounds—a working power equal to more than half the steam power of the globe."

A letter from the missionary ship John Williams, recently received at the London Mission-house, reports a visit to Erromanga in the New Hebrides. During the stay of the vessel off the islands, the very man who leveled the fatal blow at the martyred missionary Williams, came on board. He is now a learner of Christianity. The question was put to him why he killed the missionary. His reply was, "White man had been to the island, and had slain his brother and sister. He feared this man would do likewise, and so he killed him." The island is now, to a great extent reclaimed from heathenism by the labors of native evangelists.

A PUBLIC NURSERY IN LONDON.—Close by the ship yard in Portugal Street, there is a nursery for infants. Here parents who are obliged to work during the day can leave their children on payment of a small sum. They are well cared for, in a clean and well-ventilated place, lodged in snug little beds, and supplied with playthings, and—that best of instruction for early years—kind and pleasant words. It is painful to witness the bleached countenances of the most healthy of these little ones. Almost every visitor who has come here from more airy neighbourhoods has noticed this, it seems. Those of sufficient intelligence who may visit this nursery, and see, when the faces are cleansed of dirt, how white they are, and how black a tint is below the eyes, will scarcely doubt the necessity of stringent measures of sanitary inspection and improvement. This nursery was founded, and is manly supported, by the Rev. John Oliver, chaplain of King's College Hospital, who makes it the means also of affording a refuge to the convalescent female patients from the hospital, who have no place to go to. The number of children varies from 20 to 30 at a time; and milk and pudding are found them by the benevolent originator. Children are brought from Lambeth, Camden Town, and other distant localities, and the advantages afforded appear to be thoroughly appreciated by the parents.—Builder.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GRIBBLE, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev, THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL RINGOLD WARD, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1854, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Business Relations—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plans adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches auxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 12. A member of the council shall be member of only one of the committees thereof.

Art. 13. All officers holding funds, shall give security in double the amount likely to be in their hands. This security to be given to the three first officers of the council.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper government

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the rest of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS, JOHN D. PECK, AMOS G. BEMAN, JOHN JONES, J. D. BONNER, J. MCCUNE SMITH. — Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL."

5. The shares shall be payable, ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and ten per cent. every first day of July, October, January and April thereafter, until the whole is paid in.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

11. THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the TRIBUNE'S Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends six names. Subscriptions and all other communications to the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if the case) and addressed, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

Toronto, March 25th, 1854.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

MEN AND BRETHREN:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this we must occupy a position often, if not entirely of unrestricted rights, opposing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the white element of society in which we live. The policy necessary to the preservation of this element must be in our favor, if ever we expect the enjoyment, freedom, sovereignty, and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and recommend us to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring certificates properly attested, or being verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials appointed for the purpose of their identity to the full satisfaction of said Committee as the Convention is specially for, and for the friends of emigration ONLY, NONE OTHERS—and no opposition to them will be entertained.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. Indeed, both, there is no part of the wide-spread universe where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the betterment of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but will contend for them, but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been sanctioned by all delegated as such meetings of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay and will not be further bullied; and, I deem it legal of our most sanguine friends of creeds, parties to prevent an intelligent consideration of the carrying out of these measures, which has called us, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention, when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pitsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

Poetry.

God hath a Voice.

BY ELIZA COOK.

God hath a voice that is ever heard
In the peal of the thunder, the chirp of the bird;
It comes in the torrent, all rapid and strong,
In the steamlet's soft gush as it ripples along.

It breathes in the zephyr, just kissing the bloom;
It lives in the rush of the sweeping simoon;
Let the hurricane whistle, or warblers rejoice,
What do they tell thee but God hath a voice?

God hath a presence, and that you may see
In the fold of the flower, the leaf of the tree;
In the sun of the noonday, the star of the night;
In the storm cloud of darkness, the rainbow of light.

In the waves of the ocean, the furrows of land;
In the mountain of granite, the atom of sand;
Turn where you may, from the sky to the sod,
Where can ye gaze that ye see not a God?

The Daisy.

Not worlds on worlds, in phalanx deep,
Need we, to prove a God is here—
The daisy, fresh from winter's sleep,
Tells of his hands in lines as clear:

For who but He who arched the skies,
And pours the day spring's living food,
Wond'rous alike in all He tries,
Could rear the daisy's purple blood?

Mould its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spin,
And cut the gold embossed gem,
That, set in silver, gleams within?

And fling it, unrestrained and free,
O'er hill and dale, and desert sod,
That man, where'er he walks, may see
In every step the stamp of God.

Literature.

The Vacant Chair.

You have all heard of the Chevoit mountains. If you have not, they are a rough, rugged, majestic chain of hills, which a poet might term the Roman wall of nature; crowned with snow, belted with storms, surrounded by pastures and fruitful fields, and still dividing the northern portion of Great Britain from the southern. With their proud summits piercing the clouds, and their dark rocky declivities frowning upon the glens below, they appear symbolical of the wild and untameable spirits of the Borderers who once inhabited their sides. We say, you have all heard of the Chevoits, and know them to be very high hills, like a huge clasp rivetting England and Scotland together; but we are not aware that you may have heard of Marchlaw, an old, grey-looking farm-house, substantial as a modern fortress, recently, and for aught we know to the contrary, still inhabited by Peter Elliot, the proprietor of some five hundred surrounding acres. The boundaries of Peter's farm, indeed, were defined neither by fields, hedges, nor stone walls. A wooden stake here and a stone there, at considerable distances from each other, were the general landmarks; but neither Peter nor his neighbours considered a few acres worth quarreling about; and their sheep frequently visited each other's pastures in a friendly way, harmoniously sharing a family dinner, in the same spirit as their masters made themselves free at each other's tables.

Peter was placed in very unpleasant circumstances, owing to the situation of Marchlaw house, which, unfortunately, was built immediately across the "ideal line," dividing the two kingdoms; and his misfortune was, that being born within it, he knew not whether he was an Englishman or a Scotchman. He could trace his ancestral line no farther back than his great-grandfather, who, it appeared from the family Bible, had, together with his grandfather and father, claimed Marchlaw as their birth-place.—They, however, were not involved in the same perplexities as their descendant. The parlour was distinctly acknowledged to be in Scotland, and two-thirds of the kitchen were as certainly allowed to be in England: his three ancestors were born in the room over the parlour, and, therefore were Scotchmen beyond question; but Peter, unluckily, being brought into the world before the death of his grandfather, his parents occupied a room immediately over the debateable boundary line which crossed the kitchen. The room, though scarcely eight feet square, was evidently situated between the two countries; but, no one being able to ascertain what portion belonged to each, Peter, after many arguments and altercations upon the subject, was driven to the disagreeable alternative of confessing he knew not what countryman he was. What rendered the confession the more painful was, it was Peter's highest ambition to be thought a Scotchman. All his arable land lay on the Scotch side; his mother was collaterally related to the Stuarts; and few families were more ancient or respectable than the Elliots. Peter's speech, indeed, betrayed him to be a walking partition between the two kingdoms, a living representation of the Union; for in one word he pronounced the letter r with the broad, masculine sound of the North Briton, and in the next with the liquid burr of the Northumbrians.

Peter, or, if you prefer it, Peter Elliot, Esq., of Marchlaw, in the counties of Northumberland and Roxburgh, was for many years, the best runner, leaper, and wrestler between Wooler and Judburgh. Whirled from his hand, the ponderous bullet whizzed through the air like a pigeon on the wing; and the best putter on the Borders quailed from competition. As a feather in his grasp, he seized the unwieldly hammer, swept it round and round his head, accompanying with agile limb its evolutions, swiftly as swallows play around a circle, and hurled it from his hands like a shot from a rifle, till antagonists shrunk back, and the spectators burst into a shout. "Well done, Squire! the Squire forever!" once exclaimed a servile observer of titles. "Squire! wha are ye squiring at?" returned Peter. "Confound ye! where was ye when I was christened Squire? My name's Peter Elliot; your man, or onybody's man, at whatever they like!"

Peter's soul was free, bounding, and buoyant, as the wind that carolled in a zephyr, or shouted in a hurricane, upon his native hills; and his body was thirteen stone of healthy, substantial flesh, steeped in the spirits of life. He had been long married, but marriage had wrought no change upon him. They who suppose that wedlock transforms the lark into an owl, offer an insult to the lovely beings who, brightening our darkest hours with the smiles of affection, teach us that that only is unbecoming in the husband which is disgraceful in the man.—Nearly twenty years had passed over them; but Janet was still as kind, and, in his eyes as beautiful, as when, bestowing on him her hand at the altar; and he was still as happy, as generous and as free. Nine fair children sat around their domestic hearth, and one, the youngling of the flock, smiled upon its mother's knee. Peter had never known sorrow; he was blest in his wife, in his children, in his flocks. He had become richer than his fathers. He was beloved by his neighbours, the tillers of his ground, and by his herdsmen; yea, no man envied his prosperity. But a blight passed over the harvest of his joys, and gall was rained into the cup of his felicity.

It was Christmas-day, and a more melancholy looking sun never rose on the 25th of December. One vast, sable cloud, like a universal pall, overspread the heavens. For weeks, the ground had been covered with clear, dazzling snow; and as, throughout the day, the rain continued its unwearied and monotonous drizzle, the earth assumed a character and appearance melancholy and troubled as the heavens. Like a mastiff that had lost its owner, the wind howled dolefully down the glens, and was re-echoed from the caves of the mountains, as the lamentations of a legion of invisible spirits. The frowning, snow-clad precipices were instinct with motion, as avalanche upon avalanche, the larger burying the less, crowded downward in their tremendunous journey to the plain. The simple mountain rills had assumed the majesty of rivers; the broader streams were swollen into the wild torrent, and, gushing forth as cataracts, in fury and in foam, enveloped the valleys in an angry flood. But at Marchlaw, the fire blazed blithely; the kitchen groaned beneath the load of preparations for a joyful feast; and glad faces glided from room to room.

Peter Elliot kept Christmas, not so much because it was Christmas, as in honour of its being the birthday of Thomas, his first-born, who, that day, entered his nineteenth year. With a father's love, his heart yearned for all his children; but Thomas was the pride of his eyes. Cards of apology had not then found their way among our Border hills; and, as all knew that, although Peter admitted no spirits within his threshold, nor a drunkard at his table, he was, nevertheless no niggard in his hospitality, his invitations were accepted without ceremony. The guests were assembled; and the kitchen being the only apartment in the building large enough to contain them, the cloth was spread upon a long, clear oaken table, stretching from England into Scotland. On the English end of the board were placed a ponderous plum pudding, studded with temptation, and a smoking sirloin; on Scotland a savoury and well-seasoned haggis, with a sheep's head and trotters; while the intermediate space was filled with the good things of this life, common to both kingdoms and to the season.

The guests from the north, and from the south, were arranged promiscuously. Every seat was filled—save one. The chair by Peter's right hand remained unoccupied.—He had raised his hands before his eyes, and besought a blessing on what was placed before them, and was preparing to carve for his visitors, when his eyes fell upon the vacant chair. The knife dropped upon the table. Anxiety flashed across his countenance, like an arrow from an unseeen hand.

"Janet, where is Thomas?" he inquired; "hae nane o' ye seen him?" and, without waiting an answer he continued—"How is it possible he can be absent at a time like this? And on such a day too? Excuse me a minute, friends, till I just step out and see if I can find him. Since ever I kept this day, as mony o' ye ken, he has always been at my right hand, in that very chair; and I canna think o' beginning our dinner while I see it empty."

"If the filling of the chair be all," said a pert young sheep-farmer, named Johnson, "I will step into it till Master Thomas arrive."

"Ye're not a faither, young man," said Peter and walked out of the room.

Minute succeeded minute, but Peter returned not. The guests became hungry, peevish, and gloomy, while an excellent dinner continued spoiling before them. Mrs. Elliot, whose good nature was the most prominent feature in her character, strove, by every possible effort, to beguile the unpleasant impressions she perceived gathering upon their countenances.

"Peter is just as bad as him," she remarked, "to hae gane to seek him when he kenned the dinner wouldna keep. And I'm sure Thomas kenned it would be ready at one o'clock to a minute. Its' sae unthinking and unfriendly like to keep folk waiting."—And, endeavouring to smile upon a beautiful black-haired girl of seventeen, who sat by her elbow, she continued, in an anxious whisper—"Did ye see naething o' him Elizabeth, hinny?"

The maiden blushed deeply; the question evidently gave freedom to a tear, which had, for some time, been an unwilling prisoner in the brightest eyes in the room; and the monosyllable, 'No,' that trembled from her lips, was audible only to the ear of the enquirer. In vain Mrs. Elliot despatched one of her children after another, in quest of their father and brother; they came and went, but brought no tidings more cheering than the moaning hollow wind. Minutes rolled into hours, yet neither came. She perceived the prouder of her guests preparing to withdraw, and, observing that 'Thomas's absence was so singular and unaccountable, and so unlike either him or his father, she didna ken what apology to make to her friends for such treatment; but it was needless waiting, and begged they would use no ceremony, but just begin."

No second invitation was necessary. Good humor appeared to be restored, and sirloins, pies, pasties, and moorfowl began to disappear like the lost son. For a moment, Mrs. Elliot apparently partook in the restoration of cheerfulness; but a low sigh at her elbow again drove the color from her rosy cheeks. Her eye wandered to the farther end of the table, and rested on the unoccupied seat of her husband, and the vacant chair of her first-born. Her heart felt heavily within her; all the mother rushed into her bosom; and, rising from the table, 'What in the world can be the meaning o' this?' said she, as she hurried, with a troubled countenance, toward the door. Her husband met her on the threshold.

'Where hae ye been, Peter?' said she, eagerly; 'hae ye seen naething o' him?'

'Naething! naething!' replied he; 'is he no cast up yet?' And, with a melancholy glance, his eyes sought an answer in the deserted chair. His lips quivered, his tongue faltered

'Gude forgive me!' said he; 'and such a day for even an enemy to be out in! I've been up and down every way that I can think on, but not a living creature has seen or heard tell o' him. Ye'll excuse me, neebors,' he added, leaving the house; 'I must awa again, for I canna rest.'

'I ken by myself, friends, said Adam Bell, a decent-looking Northumbrian, 'that a father's heart is as sensitive as the apple o' his e'e; and I think we would shew a want o' natural sympathy and respect for our worthy neighbor, if we didna every one get his foot into the stirrup, without loss o' time, and assist him in his search. For, in my rough country way o' thinking, it must be something particularly out o' the common that could tempt Thomas to be o' missing. Indeed, I needna say tempt, for there could be no inclination in the way. And our hills,' he concluded, in a lower tone, 'are not ower chancy in other respects, besides the breaking up o' the storm.'

'Oh!' said Mrs. Elliot, wringing her hands, 'I have had the coming o' this about me for days and days. My head was growing dizzy with happiness, but thoughts came stealing upon me like ghosts, and I felt a lonely soughing about my heart, without being able to tell the cause; but the cause is come at last! And my dear Thomas—the very staff and pride o' my life—is lost!—lost to me for ever?'

'I ken, Mrs. Elliot,' replied the Northumbrian, 'it is an easy matter to say compose yourself, for them that dinna ken what it is to feel. But, at the same time, in our plain, country way or thinking, we are always ready to be believe the worst. I have often heard my faither say, and I've as often remarked it myself, that, before anything happens to a body, there is a something comes ower them, like a cloud before the face o' the sun; a sort o' dumb whispering about the breast from the other world. And, though I trust there is naething o' the kind in your case, yet, as you observe, when I find myself growing dizzy, as it were, with happiness, it makes good a saying o' my mother's poor body! 'Bairns, bairns,' she used to say, 'there is owre muckle singing in your heads to-night; we will have a shower before bed-time.' And I never, in my born days, saw it fail.

At any other period, Mr. Bell's dissertation on presentiments would have been found a fitting text on which to hang all the dreams, wraiths, warnings, and marvellous circumstances, that had been handed down to the company from the days of their grandfathers; but in the present instance, they were too much occupied in consultation regarding the different routes to be taken in the search.

Twelve horsemen, and some half-dozen pedestrians, were seen hurrying in divers directions from Marchlaw, as the last faint lights of a melancholy day were yielding to the heavy darkness which appeared pressing in solid masses down the sides of the mountains. The wives and daughters of the party were alone left with the disconsolate mother, who alternately pressed her weeping children to her heart, and told them to weep not, for their brother would soon return; while the tears stole down her cheeks, and the infant in her arms wept because its mother wept. Her friends strove with each other to inspire hope, and poured upon her ear their mingled and loquacious consolation. But one remained silent. The daughter of Adam Bell, who sat at Mrs. Elliot's elbow at table, had sunk into an obscure corner of the room. Before her face she held a handkerchief wet with tears. Her bosom throbbed convulsively; and as occasionally her broken sighs burst from their prison-house, a significant whisper passed among the younger part of the company.

Mrs. Elliot approached her, and taking her hand tenderly between both of hers—'O Hinny! hinny!' said see, 'yer sighs gae through my heart like a knife! An' what can I do to comfort ye? Come, Elizabeth, my bonny love, let us hope for the best. Ye see before ye a sorrowin' mother!—a mother that fondly hoped to see you an'—I canna say it!—an' am ill qualified to gie comfort, when my own heart is like a furnace! But, oh! let us try and remember the blessed portion,—'Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth,' an' inwardly pray for strength to say, 'His will be done!'

Time stole on towards midnight, and one after one of the unsuccessful party returned. As foot after foot approached, every breath was heard to listen. 'No, no, no!' cried the mother, again, and again, with increasing anguish, 'It's no the foot o' my ain bairn;' while her keen gaze still remained riveted upon the door, and was not withdrawn, nor the hope of despair relinquished, till the individual entered, and with a silent and ominous shake of his head, betokened his fruitless efforts. The clock had struck twelve; all were returned save the father. The wind howled more wildly; the rain poured upon the windows in ceaseless torrents; and the roaring of the mountain rivers gave a character of deeper ghostliness to their sepulchral silence; for they sat, each rapt in forebodings, listening to the storm; and no sounds were heard, save the groans of the mother, the weeping of her children, and the bitter and broken sobs of the bereaved maiden, who leaned her head upon her father's bosom, refusing to be comforted.

At length, the barking of the farm-dog announced foot-steps at a distance. Every ear was raised to listen, every eye was turned to the door; but, before the tread was yet audible to the listeners—'Oh, it is only Peter's foot!' said the miserable mother, and, weeping, arose to meet him.

'Janet! Janet!' he exclaimed, as he entered, and threw his arms around her neck, 'what's this come upon us at last?'

He cast an inquisitive glance around his dwelling, and a convulsive shiver passed over his manly frame, as his eye again fell on the vacant chair, which no one had ventured to occupy.—Hour succeeded hour, but the company separated not; and low, sorrowful whispers mingled with the lamentations of the parents.

'Neighbors,' said Adam Bell, 'the morn is a new day, and we will wait to see what it may bring forth; but, in the meantime, let us read a portion o' the Divine word, an' kneel together in prayer, that, whether or not the day-dawn cause light to shine upon this singular bereavement, the Sun o' Righteousness may arise wi' healing on his wings, upon the hearts o' this afflicted family, an' upon the hearts o' all present.'

'Amen!' responded Peter, wringing his hand, and his friend taking down the Ha' Bible, read the chapter where it is written—'It is better to be in the house of mourning than in the house of feasting;' and again the portion which sayeth—'it is well for me that I have been afflicted, for before I was afflicted, I went astray.'

The morning came, but brought no tidings of the lost son. After a solemn farewell, all the visitants, save Adam Bell and his daughter, returned every one to their own houses; and the disconsolate father, with his servants, again renewed their search among the hills and surrounding villages.

Days, weeks, months, and years rolled on. Time had subdued the anguish of the parents into a holy calm; but their lost first-born was not forgotten, although no trace of his fate had been discovered. The general belief was that he had perished in the breaking up of the snow; and the few in whose remembrance he still lived, merely spoke of his death as a 'very extraordinary circumstance,' remarked that 'he was a wild venturesome sort o' lad.'

Christmas had succeeded Christmas, and Peter Elliot still kept it in commemoration of the birth-day of him who was not. For the first few years after the loss of their son, sadness and silence characterised the party who sat down to dinner at Marchlaw, and still at Peter's right hand was placed the vacant chair. But, as the younger branches of the family advanced in years, the remembrances of their brother became less poignant. Christmas was, with all around them, a day of rejoicing, and they began to make merry with their friends; while their parents partook in their enjoyments, with a smile, half of approval, and half of sorrow.

Twelve years had passed away; Christmas had again come. It was the counterpart of its fatal predecessor. The hills had not yet cast off their summer verdure; the sun, although shorn of its heat, had lost none of its brightness or glory, and looked down upon the earth as though participating in its gladness; and the clear blue sky was tranquil as the sea sleeping beneath the moon. Many visitors had again assembled at Marchlaw. The sons of Mr. Elliot, and the younger men of the party, were assembled upon a level green near the house, amusing themselves with throwing the hammer and other border games, while himself and the elder guests stood by as spectators, recounting the deeds of their youth. Johnson, the sheep farmer, whom we have already mentioned, now a brawny and gigantic fellow of two-and-thirty, bore away in every game the palm from all competitors. More than once as Peter beheld his sons defeated, he felt the spirit of youth glowing in his veins, and, 'Oh!' muttered he in bitterness, 'had my Thomas been spared to me, he would hae thrown his heart's bluid after the hammer, before he would hae been beat by e'er a Johnson in the country!'

While he thus soliloquized, and with difficulty restrained an impulse to compete with the victor himself, a dark, foreign-looking, strong-built seaman, unceremoniously approached, and with his arms folded, cast a look of contempt on the boasting conqueror. Every eye was turned with a scrutinizing glance upon the stranger. In height he could not exceed five feet nine, but his whole frame was the model of muscular strength; his features were open and manly, but deeply sunburnt and weather-beaten; his long, glossy, black hair, curled into ringlets by the breeze and the billow, fell thickly over his temples and forehead; and whiskers of a similar hue, more conspicuous for size than elegance, gave a character of fierceness to a countenance otherwise possessing a striking impress of manly beauty. Without asking permission, he stepped forward, lifted the hammer, and, swinging it around his head, hurled it upwards of five yards beyond Johnson's most successful throw. 'Well done!' shouted the astonished spectators. The heart of Peter Elliot warmed within him, and he was hurrying forward to grasp the stranger by the hand, when the words groaned in his throat, 'It was just such a throw as my Thomas would have made!—my own lost Thomas!' The tears burst into his eyes, and, without speaking, he turned his back, and hurried towards the house, to conceal his emotions.

Successively, at every game, the stranger had defeated all who ventured to oppose him; when a messenger announced that dinner wait-their arrival. Some of the guests were already seated, others entering; and, as heretofore, placed beside Mrs. Elliot, was Elizabeth Bell, still in the moontide of her beauty; but sorrow passed over her features, like a veil before the countenance of an angel. Johnson, crest-fallen and out of humor at his defeat, seated himself by her side. In early life, he had regarded Thomas Elliot as a rival for her affections; and, stimulated with the knowledge that Adam Bell would be able to bestow several thousands upon his daughter as a dowry, he yet prosecuted his attentions with unabated assiduity in despite of the daughter's aversion and the coldness of her father. Peter had taken his place at the table; and still by his side, unoccupied and sacred, appeared the vacant chair, the chair of his first-born, whereon none had sat since his mysterious death or disappearance.

'Bairns,' said he, 'did nane o' ye ask the sailor to come up and take a bit o' dinner wi' us?'

'We were afraid it might lead to a quarrel with Mr. Johnson,' whispered one of his sons.

'He is come without asking,' replied the stranger, entering; and the wind shall blow from a new point if I destroy the mirth or happiness of the company.'

'Ye're a stranger, young man,' said Peter, 'or ye would ken this is no a meeting o' mirth-makers. But, I assure, ye, ye are welcome, heartily welcome. Haste ye, lassies,' he added to the servants; 'some o' ye get a chair for the gentleman.'

'Gentleman, indeed!' muttered Johnson between his teeth.

'Never mind about a chair,' my hearties,' said the seaman,; 'this will do!'. And before Peter could speak to withhold him, he had thrown himself carelessly into the hallowed, the venerated, the twelve-years-unoccupied chair! The spirit of sacrilege uttering blasphemies from a pulpit could not have smitten a congregation of pious worshippers with deeper horror and consternation, than this filling of the vacant chair the inhabitants of Marchlaw.

Excuse me, sir! excuse me, sir!' said Peter, the words trembling on his tongue; 'but ye canna—ye canna sit there!

'O man! man!' cried Mrs. Elliot, 'get out o' that! get out o' that!—take my chair!—take ony chair i' the house!—but dinna sit there! It has never been sat in by mortal being since the death o' my dear bairn!—and to see it filled by another is a thing I canna endure!'

'Sir! sir!' continued the father, 'ye have done it through ignorance, and we excuse ye. But that was my Thomas's seat! Twelve years this very day—his birth-day—he perished Heaven kens how! He went out from our sight like the cloud that passed over the hills—never—never to return. And, O sir! spare a father's feelings! for to see it filled wrings the blood from my heart!'

'Give me your hand my worthy soul!' exclaimed the seaman; 'I revere—nay hang it! I would die for your feelings! But Tom Elliot was my friend, and I cast anchor in this chair by special commission. I know that a sudden broadside of joy is a bad thing; but as I don't know how to preach a sermon before telling you all I have to say is—that Tom ain't dead.'

'Not dead!' said Peter, grasping the hand of the stranger, and speaking with an eagerness that almost choked his utterance; 'O sir! sir! tell me how!—how!—Did ye say, lving?—Is my ain Thomas living?

'Not dead, did ye say?' cried Mrs. Elliot, hurrying towards him and grasping his other hand—'not dead! And shall I see my bairn again? Oh! may the blessings o' Heaven, and the blessing o' a broken-hearted mother be upon the bearer of the gracious tidings! But tell me!—tell me, now is it possible! As ye would expect happiness here or hereafter, dinna, dinna deceive me!

'Deceive you! returned the stranger, grasping with impassioned earnestness, their hands in his—'Never! never! and all I can say is, Tom Elliot is alive and hearty.

'No, no!' said Elizabeth, rising from her seat 'he does not deceive us; there is that in his countenance which bespeaks a falsehood impossible. And she also endeavoured to move towards him, when Johnson threw his arm around her to withhold her.

'Hands off, you land-lubber!' exclaimed the seaman, springing towards them, 'or shiver me! I'll shew daylight through your timbers in the turning of a hand-spike. And clasping the lovely girl in his arms, 'Betty! Betty, my love!' he cried, 'don't you know your own Tom? Father, mother, don't you know me? Have you really forgotten your own son? If twelve years have made some change on his face, his heart is sound as ever.'

His father, his mother, and his brothers clung around him, weeping, smiling, and mingling a hundred questions together. He threw his arms around the necks of each, and in answer to their inquiries, replied—'Well! well! there is time enough to answer questions, but not to-day, not to-day.

'No, my bairn,' said his mother, 'we'll ask you no questions—nobody shall ask ye any! But how—how were you torn away from us, my love? And, O hinny! where—where hae ye been?

'It is a long story, mother, said he, and would take a week to tell it. But, however, to make a long story short, you remember when the smugglers were pursued, and wished to conceal their brandy in our house, my father prevented them: they left muttering revenge—and they have been revenged. This day twelve years, I went out with the intention of meeting Elizabeth and her father, when I came upon a party of the gang concealed in Hell's Hole. In a moment half a dozen pistols were held to my breast, and, tying my hands to my sides, they dragged me into the cavern. Here I had not been long their prisoner, when the snow rolling down the mountains, almost totally blocked up its mouth. On the second night, they cut through the snow, and, hurrying me along with them, I was bound to a horse between two, and before day-light, found myself stowed, like a piece of old junk, in the hold of a smugglers lugger. Within a week I was shipped on a Dutch man-of-war, and for six years was kept dogging about on different stations, till our old yawling hulk received orders to join the fleet, which was to fight against the gallant Duncan at Camperdown. To think of fighting against my own countrymen, my own flesh and blood, was worse than to be cut to pieces by a cat-o'-nine tails; and under cover of the smoke of the first broadside, I sprang into the gunwhale, plunged into the sea, and swam for the English fleet. Never, shall I forget the moment that my feet first trod upon the deck of a British frigate! My nerves felt as firm as her oak, and my heart free as the pennant that waved defiance from his masthead! I was active as any one during the battle; and, when it was over, and I found myself again among my own countrymen, men, and all speaking my own language, I fancied—nay, hang it! I almost believed—I should meet my father, mother, or my dear Bess, on board of the British frigate. I expected to see you all again in a few weeks at farthest; but, instead of returning to Old England, before I was aware, it was helm about with us. As to writing, I never had an opportunity but once. We were at anchor before a French fort; a packet was lying alongside ready to sail; I had half a side written, and was scratching my head to think how I should come over writing about you, Bess, my love, when, as bad look would have it, our lieutenant comes to me, and says he, 'Elliot, I know you like a little smart service; come, my lad, take the head oar, while we board some of those French gun-boats under the batteries!' I couldn't say no. We pulled ashore, made a bonfire of some of their craft, and were setting fire to a second, when a deadly fire of small-shot from the garrison scuttled our boat, killed our commanding officer with half of the crew, and the few of us who were left were made prisoners. It is of no use bothering you by telling you how we escaped from the French prison. We did escape; and Tom will once more fill his vacant chair.

Should any of our readers wish farther acquaintance with our friends, all we can say is, the new year was still young when Adam Bell bestowed his daughter's hand upon the heir of Marchlaw, and Peter beheld the once vacant chair again occupied, and a namesake of the third generation prattling on his knee.

ACCLIMATION OF ANIMALS.—M. Geoffrey Saint Hilaire and other eminent naturalists in France are beginning to turn their serious attention to the acclimation or domestication of animals which have hitherto been totally unknown to Europe, or known as objects of scientific or idle curiosity. Within the last month they have received for the Jardin des Plantes, at Paris, a number of yaks, from China—an animal which Buffon says "is more precious than all the gold of the New World." In Thibet and China this animal serves as a horse, an ass, a cow, and a sheep; he bears heavy burdens, draws large loads, supplies milk, has flesh which is excellent, and hair which can be wrought into warm clothes. To naturalize him, therefore, in Europe would be an immense service to mankind; and as he bears cold bravely the French naturalists have every hope that they will be able to do so, though, by the way, the late Lord Derby made the attempt, and failed. Some Chinese have been brought over to attend the yaks, and they will teach the French the way of treating them, and curing them in sickness. The yaks are of a lowish stature, are singularly shaggy, and have tails more bushy than those of horses. It is to be hoped that England will take her share in endeavoring to accustom Asiatic, American and African animals to our European climates. It is not very creditable to our boasted nineteenth century that, in this respect, it is far behind the old Romans; out of the many thousand species of which the animal creation consists only between forty and fifty are in fact domesticated.—Literary Gazette.

Industry and Perseverance.

The following extract from Burnap's Lectures, is worthy the attention of all young men:

When you have sufficient intelligence to perceive what you ought to be, and judgment enough to discern what you may be, and decision enough to determine what you will be, the next indispensable qualities to success are industry and perseverance.—Labour is the universal law, a law in which all who have their fortunes to make, that is, all the young and enterprising, ought especially to rejoice. Labour is the grand magician, which is secretly conveying the good things of this world from hand to hand, while mankind look on and wonder how it is done. Who now possess the wealth and high places of the land? Mainly those who labour for them hard and long. From whose hands are they imperceptibly gliding? From those who are too indolent to keep them. It is incredible what mere industry will accomplish in this world of toil—I had almost said it is the prime requisite.

It is wonderful what deception lurks under a few common words and phrases in our language. "What a fortunate man," we hear the world exclaim, when they see a man flourishing in his business. In nine cases out of ten, the very term is a flattering unction, which the indolent and enterprising man is laying to his soul, that the only difference between him and him and his successful neighbour, is that of luck.—In a majority of instances he may at venture substitute in the place of fortune, industry. He may say before he examines the case, the cause of success was the same as was observed of Julius Cæsar. He always succeeded because he left nothing undone which would ensure success.

Let not the young mind repine at the law of labour, and the inevitable and inexorable necessity of personal exertion which it imposes upon him. It is the most favourable thing to those who have their own way to make in this world, and is among the favourable circumstances by which they are surrounded. It is the great agrarian law, which, in a manner, leaves all distinctions, and gives the poor man an inheritance in this world more certain, though not so extensive, as the rich, in his own talents, faculties, and caprices. By making all welfare and acquisition depend on labour, all mankind are provided for.

What Poor Boys can do by Perseverance.

Two young men came to Lowell, a few years ago, from New Hampshire, and went to work in a bobbin factory. After remaining there awhile, they heard of the Teacher's Seminary in this town, and thought they would make the attempt to qualify themselves to teach, notwithstanding their indigence. They came here with a few hard-earned dollars in their pockets, saved from their small wages by the strictest economy. Board in "Common" at that time cost the students about 80 cents per week. This they thought too expensive living for their limited means, and consequently they hired a room; bought a bag of Indian meal, and commenced boarding themselves. They made such rapid proficiency in their studies, that after spending two terms at the institution, they went to New Jersey and taught the first winter. They continued to teach winters and attend school summers, until one of them became qualified to take charge of a High School in one of our cities, and and continues its principal, at the present time, receiving a salary of one thousand dollars per year. The other brother prepared for college, entered the Theological Seminary in New Haven, spent three years, and completed his course with distinguished honors. Besides sustaining himself through his collegiate and theological education by his own exertions, he laid up twelve hundred dollars. This was earned by being Tutor, and other fortunate perquisites. The surplus furnished means for a tour over the European continent, fifteen hundred miles of which were travelled on foot. After his return to this country, he was offered a salary, by one society, of twenty-five hundred dollars, and by another, fifteen hundred dollars, for one sermon a Sabbath, and a vacation of two months per year, at that. He has chosen to accept a professorship in a Western College.—Andover Advocate.

The Darvel Arithmetical Prodigy.

The Ayr Observer describes an examination of Margaret Clelland, the Darvel girl of nine years of age, at the Ayr Academy, on Monday last. The facility with which she is said to have gone through the various questions given her is truly astonishing: She adds the three columns of compound addition as one. She can also work sums in compound multiplication by such figures as 396 at once. In division, also she divides by 898 or similar divisors, as in short division, and with great rapidity. In mental arithemetic, she gave several proofs of her marvellous memory. To be able to go up the figures in compound addition, keeping correct recollection of every change, is not a little surprising; but to be able to tell the number of hours or seconds in any given number of years, without the slate, is what very few can do, as it requires the multiplication of the number of years by 365, the product of that by 24, and that by 60. This, however, Margaret effected with the most extraordinary rapidity; indeed, she only took a few seconds to give the answer. Another wonderful instance she gave, proving how tenacious her memory is. A pretty long example was written on the slate, five figures across, which she was told to add, and look at carefully, and write on the other side of the slate. After adding it up, and looking at it for seven or eight seconds, she turned the slate and wrote the whole of the figures down. She could tell the hours of the clock, when only two years old.

One half of human life is made up of wasted consideration. The highways of the world are strewed with the sands of thoughts cast away. The events over which we have no control, affect our destiny a thousand-fold more than the few that we can govern; and while we ponder over our decision, fate decides for us and the game is played.

Always suspect a man who has arrived at the age of thirty, and isn't attached to a pic of calico!

Creeping Things.—Let me put a spider into a lady's hand, says Dickens, she is aghast. She shrieks—The nasty, ugly thing. Madam, the spider is perhaps shocked at your Brussel's lace; and though you may be the most exquisite painter living, the spider has a right to laugh at your coarse daubs as she runs over them. Just show her your crochet work when you shriek at her. Have you spent half your days upon these clumsy anti-macassars and those ottoman covers? My dear lady, is that your web? If I were big enough, I might with reason drop you and cry out at you. Let me spend a day and bring my work. I have four little bags of thread—such little bags! In every bag there are more than 1,000 holes—such tinny, tinny holes! Out of each hole a thread runs and all the threads—more than 4,000 threads—I spin together as they run, and when they are all spun they make but one thread of the web I weave. I have a member of my family who is herself no bigger than a grain of sand. Imagine what a slender web she makes, and of that too, each thread is made of 4,000 or 5,000 threads that have passed out of her four bags through 4,000 or 5,000 little holes. Would you drop her, too, crying out about our delicacy? A pretty thing, indeed, for you to plume yourself on your delicacy, and scream at us.' Having made such a speech, we may suppose that the indignant creature fastens a robe around one of the rough points of the lady's hand, and lets herself down lightly to the floor. Coming down stairs is noisy, clumsy work, compared to such a way of locomotion. The creeping things we scorn are miracles of beauty. They are more delicate than any ormolu cloak or any lady's watch, made for pleasure's sake, no bigger than a shilling. Lyonet counted 4,041 muscles in a single caterpillar, and these are a small part only of its works. Hook found 14,000 mirrors in the eye of a bluebottle, and there are 13,000 separate bits that go to provide nothing but the act of breathing in a carp.

Submarine Navigation.—The great invention of the day—the submarine navigation of Dr. Payerne—is about to be put in practice at Cherbourg, the company purchasing the invention having volunteered to cleanse the harbor, free of expense to the Government. The secret consists in the discovery of the means whereby artificial air may be produced in sufficient quantity to enable a crew of fourteen men to breathe freely beneath the water for the space of four hours. A curious experiment has been already made at Marseilles, where Dr. Payerne, in company with three sailors, went to the bottom in presence of hundreds of spectators, and rose at a considerable distance, and climbed the portholes of a man-of-war, without being perceived by the crew.—Many experiments are about to be tried for the efficacy of this novel means of attack. A submarine fleet of small boats, each to contain a crew of twenty men, is already talked of as about to be organized for the Black Sea. It seems that no intimation whatever is given by the slightest ruffle on the surface, of the approach of one of these vessels. The apparatus invented by Dr. Payerne enables the wearer, moreover to move about with ease at the bottom of the sea, and great anticipations are formed of the immense benefit to be derived in submarine history from the adoption of this new method of becoming acquainted with the hitherto unknown mystery of the ocean. However, it is not a bad reflection on the spirit of the age in which we live to remark, that the first application of this tremendous power, which should take rank with the electric telegraph as proof of the wonderous perseverance and energy of man, has been made use of for the supply of oysters from Granville for the halles of Paris—Paris Correspondence of the London Atlas.

The Philosophy of Human Nature Demonstrated by Masonic Teachings.

The philosophy of human nature constitutes the basis on which the temple of universal knowledge should be erected. The study of mathematics gives a firmness to the mind, and enables it to discriminate with exactness and determine with precision. The contemplations of cosmography raise the thoughts, and expand the intellectual faculties. The attainments of polite literature refine the taste and beautify the social character. But it is the sublime lessons of Masonry, which inculcate a knowledge of ourselves, and impart to these pursuits their dignified importance and grand utility.

Could man suddenly undergo a perfect change, and lose all these principles which are essential to his present nature, the subjects of his pursuits, and the objects of his attention, must likewise be completely metamorphosed. The value of these acquisitions, which are now deemed his best accomplishments, would soon vanish, while those ornaments, which are requisite to adorn his present character, would lose their boasted excellence. Therefore, every acquirement within the range of universal literature, becomes important only in consequence of its real adaptation to the state of man. Philosophy enthroned on human nature, arranges every science, marshals all the principles of general knowledge, looks around on the wide creation, and endeavors to render everything subservient to the safety of her favorite throne, and the prosperity of her native empire. Her foreign conquests, extensive commerce, and general intercourse with every department of the natural and moral world, are designed to ameliorate the condition, advance the excellence, and ensure the felicity of human nature. The knowledge of himself, therefore, is the noblest pursuit of man. But what is man? What are the elements which constitute his nature? What gives him such transcendant influence in the scale of universal being? Man is the highest order of the visible creation, the oldest inhabitant of the present world, and the terrestrial sovereign of animated nature. What is the most perfect mark of the greatness of man, of his high exaltation above other animals? The commerce he holds with his creator, the capacity to know Him and to have fellowship with Him. Man alone soars to God, the principal; and prostrate at the foot of the throne of the Almighty, he adores with the profoundest sentiments of veneration, and with the most lively gratitude, the ineffable goodness that created him. This is the foundation on which Masonry rests, and the first step taken by a candidate, on entering the Masonic Temple, teaches him its sublime truths. In the degrees of Masonry, we begin with the entered apprentice, which signifies a beginning to learn. To learn what? Three great duties "to God—your neighbour, and yourself." The last, self-knowledge, rightly pursued, is the patent of excellence, and leads to the performance of the other two. Without which, it is impossible for us to obtain a correct idea of our own nature. Its cultivation will enable us to detect those ideas which are erroneous, confirm those which are doubtful, elucidate whatever appears mysterious and enlarge the boundaries of self-knowledge.—Philadelphia Masonic Mirror.

Woman's Rights.

As a married man, it is, of course, a matter of some interest to us to notice the discussion of this subject, as it is now going on, and as it has been before the public for several years.

Since our residence in Canada, we have not written a syllable, and scarcely have we spoken a word upon the question. But, in more ways than one, the course of this journal, upon this question, has been inquired about, and we now, possibly, once for all, beg to indicate our views, being free to confess that matters of far greater moment will, hereafter, demand and receive attention from our hands.

In the first place, the definition of Woman's Rights must either be given by Women or Men. Men, as a general thing, in all parts of the British Empire, (for we do not touch it otherwise than as a British question) declare that women have all the rights which by nature or revelation, is made hers. She may be a clerk, a partner, banker, a proprietress, a queen. In any of these positions, the law accords to her the same defence and protection as to men. These, with the social influence she is empowered to wield, say British Men, are all that she can, rightfully, claim. Were the advocates of Women's Rights agreed to this, there would be just no bone of contention at all. If, then, we turn to Women for a definition, we find, first, that the great majority of them, are quite content with things as they are, and substantially, if not literary and perfectly, agreeing to the Men's definition. And, secondly, we find the very Women who most ably write, and speak, upon the question, differing as to what are the rights of their sex.

Then again, some Men, foolishly deny to a Woman the right to speak in public, to practice medicine, or to vote. While some Women, as foolishly, claim the right to exercise various functions, for which neither God nor nature designed them, and which are utterly inconsistent with their social duties.

Let us look a little at these. The question of difference betwixt the different classes of Women's Rights-folks, we beg to leave to themselves, for the two-fold reason, that they cannot agree upon them, and that this question is as yet foreign to our British social system.

As to Women's speaking in public meetings, we think that depends altogether upon her fitness for it. Has she anything to say? Can she say it? Does she say it with propriety? Does she mount the platform at the expense of the duties she owes to her family?

As to the Scriptural objection, there are two sides to that, as there are two sides to other objections. Quakers, Primitive Methodists, and some others, think one way, so do individuals among other denominations. Most denominations, however, take the opposite view.

Perhaps there are no people who insist more rigidly upon the silence of Women than the Scotch. And yet, in December last, in the famous classic city of Edinburgh, which every Scotchman knows to be the first city in Christendom, (whether anybody else knows it or not) Mrs. Chisholm, delivered a public address, to a mixed audience, The Right Honorable, The Lord Provost in the chair!!!

Why Woman should not treat the diseases of her own sex, diseases which may be peculiar to her sex, we cannot tell; and we never found anybody that could, or at least, that did tell us. And how it can be more indelicate for a female doctor to attend a sick man than for a male doctor to attend a sick woman, is another thing beyond our humble ken. A Woman may be a nurse to both sexes. Oh, yes! and as a nurse or "granny" she may administer medicine, at second-hand, but to prescribe! Oh! that would be dreadful! All we have to say about this, is—Pshaw! It certainly but ill becomes us, to say a great deal against a Woman's having to do with politics, when at the head of our Government, the greatest and the freest on the earth, stands a Woman, and she the very best Sovereign that ever swayed the British sceptre, or sat on the British throne! And, by the way, the ruling of Queens will bear most triumphant comparison, with the ruling of Kings, past and present.

If, on the other hand, as some exceedingly "weaker vessels" say, they can do, and ought to be allowed to do all that Men do, we shall believe more of it, when we see them successfully trying their skill, at the exhibition of a little more common sense, about the most ordinary matters. When reason, and not fashion, shall control Women in the length of their dresses, the sise of their bonnets, the covering of their children's extremities, or, rather, those portions of them which are not very extreme.—Aye, and when they shall exercise a little common justice in estimating vice and virtue, as betwixt their own and the opposite sex, then shall we, and the world, pay more attention to their boastful claims.

There now! Can you tell where we stand on Women's Rights? We confess we can not.

"Spirit Manifestations Examined and Explained."

This matter of Spirit Manifestation has assumed such importance on this continent that it cannot longer be ignored by religious journals. The "Manifestations," as they are called, are of daily occurrence in almost all parts of the country in the various forms of writing, rapping, table-moving, &c. The number of believers in the spiritual or supersensuous origin of these Manifestations is steadily on the increase; among these are to be found some of the purest and most intelligent minds on this side of the Atlantic. The belief is not confined to the low and unlearned by any means. Such men as Rev. J. B. Walker, author of that celebrated work,—"Philosophy of the Plan of Salvation," and Charles Beecher are among the believers in their spiritual character, believing them to be the work of evil spirits. Mr. Beecher is the author of a report on the subject, published by a committee of the association to which he belongs. In this report Mr. B. enters at length into a critical and learned examination of the various scientific explanations which the savans of the literary world have given of the matter, such as the theory based on electricity, biology, magnetism, odic force, &c., &c., and discards them all, as unsatisfactory in their conclusions, and contradictory one with the other; and concludes by describing all to diabolical agency alone. The facts respecting the Manifestations cannot be denied. Their philosophy is the puzzle. Scientific investigations have hitherto been lamentably deficient and contradictory. Faraday assumes to have detected the cause in involuntary muscular action; but how does he account for tables moving without the imposition of hands? Mr. Dodds thinks he has made the discovery, that the cause of motion lies in the involuntary powers of the mind! Which of the voluntarists is to be believed, Faraday or Dodds? Who can decide when doctors differ! Mr. Dodds, with praiseworthy candour, admits that it is not a humbug, sustained by collusion, deception or trick; that mediums, with exceptional cases, are honest, many of them learned, and some of them ministers of the Gospel. Now, any one who will give himself the trouble to investigate, may learn these facts for himself. The Manifestations being facts and not fictions, how are they to be accounted for? Mr. Dodds "explains." They are produced by the involuntary powers of the mind, through the nervous force of those persons only, who are either in an electro-psychological, or in a mesmeric state, or in an entire or partially cataleptic state—these three. Truly these involuntary powers of ours are wonderful and terrible powers! Hear what Mr. D. says they do: "Drive men to insanity, to suicide, to disturb the repose of society, to bereave husbands of their companions, to make wives widows, children orphans."

It is a matter of thankfulness that they are not of such an involuntary character as places them utterly beyond the control of the will, as Mr. D. exhorts mediums to "give up their silly and foolish enterprise." The operation of these powers may be voluntarily stopped, it appears, after all. But it must be confessed that, admitting the motion of a table, by an unseen power, the spiritual theory is less hard to believe than the following: "The millions of pores in the table are filled with electro-magnetism from human brains, so that with the slightest united effort from the fingers of the surrounding circle, it can be raised as high as their heads—but no higher.

But Mr. Dodds is not willing to abide by his involuntary power of the mind of theory in every case. He says, "persons have seen apparently a table rise from the floor to the ceiling, but they were in the electro-psychological state." Here is confusion worse confounded. Tables are admitted to have moved at times, but other times they have not moved at all! It was an optical illusion! But how are we to know that a table moves in any case? Why, when, like Mahomet's coffin, it hangs suspended between the floor and the ceiling, but if it passes up to the ceiling—then, presto, pass, it is not at the ceiling but on the floor! It has moved only in appearance, not in fact. Mr. D. furthermore tells us in his book, that "a person often passes into a mesmeric state instantly, without being conscious of any transition from one state to the other." Indeed! Well, then, how is it possible to know that tables move at all? Mr. D. has gathered a multitude of facts to sustain his theory; but if this last doctrine be true, how are we to know that his facts are not fictions. What he states on the testimony of others may be their waking dreams, for what we or they know to the contrary.

How are we to know indeed that he was not himself under a biological impression when he undertook to examine and explain the Spirit Manifestations? When he saw tables move, mayhap they only moved in appearance. Now, tables are moved or they are not! If they are not moved, why does Mr. Dodds attempt to explain how they are moved? If they are moved, why, after explaining how they are moved, does he throw in the suspicion of their not being moved at all? The Spirit Manifestations will bear further examination; but not Mr. Dodds' book.

The very fact that scientific men are not agreed touching the cause of these Manifestations, and that their various conflicting theories fail to satisfy thinking minds conversant with the facts in the case, and that there is neither trickery nor collusion involved in the matter, ought to lead us to give a candid hearing to those who assert its supernatural origin. The whole thing is beginning to assume an aspect that can neither be laughed nor sneered away.

On the one hand, the religious faith of thousands is being underminded, on the other hand, many who were sceptical of a future state, and under the bondage of a gross materialism, are now trembling alive to the important fact of a future state, which they believe to have been demonstrated. An overwhelming interest in a future has turned the brains of not a few, while many more seem to be in a state of possession very much akin to that prevalent in India in the days of Christ and his Appostles. If Satan is let loose upon the world in the form of Spiritual Manifestations, it is important that we should be made acquainted with his devices and put upon our guard. With the permission of the Editor, I may advert to this subject again.

The St. Catharine's Meeting.

The manly expression of indignation, by the coloured men of St. Catharines, speaks volumes for themselves and their adopted country. It is clear enough that coloured men need not accept service in hotels, in Canada, at the expense of principle as their only alternative, when the woods and fertile fields of the country invite them to a support.

The Provincial Union.—The Parent Society of the Provincial Union, was formed on Wednesday evening last, in the Sayer Street Chapel. The proceedings will be given next week.

Fruits and Farinacea, the Proper Food of Man:

Being an attempt to prove from History, Anatomy, Physiology, and Chemistry, that the original, natural, and best Diet of Man is derived from the Vegetable Kingdom. By John Smith. With Notes and Illustrations by R. T. Trall, M. D. Fowlers and Wells, Publishers.

Parts II., III., and IV. of the above work have been received. This work is, as its title indicates, an attempt to prove the superiority of vegetable over animal food, and certainly contains very strong arguments in support of the position assumed. And also the experience of many men and women noted for conforming to a strictly vegetable diet. The importance of health and of the knowledge necessary to promote it, should secure for the work a careful reading.

Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

Mr. Freeman,—You will much oblige me if you will insert the following, which I sent as an apology to the Colonist of last week, considering in due to the gentlemanly Proprietors of that Journal. I am glad that my confidence, with many others, were not misplaced, when we looked upon its change into the hands of its present Proprietors, as an ample guarantee that its former hostility towards colored people would cease, and we should be blessed with its friendship:

To the Editor of the Colonist:

Sir,—I beg you to accept the following apology: I regret that I was so hasty as not to wait a few days to see if the Colonist would publish the correction I sent to him; but I felt annoyed, as did many others of my brethren, that it should go out to the world that we were so disloyal to our Queen as to put any one before her. It is due, however, to Mr. Thompson, one of the present Proprietors of that Journal, to say that he is a gentleman well known to many of us; and we have good reasons to believe that he would do nothing, wilfully, to injure the colored people.

Yours, respectfully,
Thos. Smallwood.

Toronto, August 11, 1854.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman:

Mr. Editor:—In a copy of your paper of a late date, I saw an article written by M. R. Delany, calling upon the coloured people to meet at the National Convention, to be held in Cleaveland, on the 24th of August, and following days, for the purpose of taking into consideration which would be the best country to emigrate to; I therefore wish to give you my views on it. I am of opinion that it would be much better to emigrate to Canada, as it is considerably nearer than the West Indies, and, taking into consideration the least expense that must be incurred, by emigrating to the West Indies, I think you will agree with me that two-thirds of the people could not effect such an emigration,—whereas, all could emigrate to Canada, where the climate is more healthy, and the soil, if properly cultivated, would be equally as fertile as that of the West Indies. He says the question is whether emigration will make their condition worse. I emphatically assert that it cannot. Arouse the minds of our brethren, and keep that good feeling alive, for I have been long wishing to see it. If you look back and see how generally we have been oppressed, and still are, by the blood-hounds, our slave-masters—how we were kept in the most servile bondage, and treated more like—nay, even worse than brutes. Think you that any country, be it situated in the remotest part of the world, would not be an hundred-fold better than the one they are now in, where they are suffering every minute under the lash of their inhuman masters?—No, I say that your condition cannot be made worse than it is at present, but infinitely better by emigrating to the Canadas.

I hope and trust that the time will come when a thorn will have grown up in Canada, that will be a tool in the bosoms of the oppressors. The only way to improve that thorn, would be to emigrate to Canada, where we can have an eye open to the movements of our enemies.

Doctor Burke.

Brampton, July 31, 1854.

For the "Provincial Freeman."

Disgraceful Outrages.

For some weeks past it has been the policy of drivers of omnibusses belonging to the St. Catharine's House and the American Hotel, to exclude coloured people therefrom; or, by special indulgence, allow them to ride outside. Some four weeks ago, the Rt. Rev. Paul Quinn, of Philadelphia, Bishop of the African Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States and Canada, came to the St. Cathorine's Depot in a feeble state of health. This fine old gentleman, whose presence would honour any board of Bishops, was compelled to climb up and take his seat outside to ride into town. More recently, the Rev. Dr. Payne, Bishop of the same Church, a man of superior intelligence and refinement of manners, who would pass as an accomplished gentleman among all civilized and enlightened people, with his wife, an accomplished lady-like person, came over from Toronto by the new steamer Welland. He had nothing to complain of till he reached Port Dalhousie. He was there excluded from the two omnibusses, upon the false pretence that they were pledged to parties; being a mild, amiable man, richly imbued with the spirit of gentleness, he would not contend with the drivers, who first took advantage of him by lying. He was in a poor state of health, not having fully recovered from a severe turn of illness experienced in Toronto. With his wife, he was compelled to remain at the Port till a late hour in the night, when a conveyance was sent down for them by the Rev. Mr. Copeland, who was permitted to ride up outside.

But a short time since, the Rev. John Garrow, a free coloured minister from New Orleans, of fine appearance and more than ordinary intelligence, came to the Railroad station; and here, for the first time upon his long journey of nearly 3000 miles, met with insult from carriers, being refused a seat in an omnibuss. A coloured gentleman of fortune lately came from Mobile, who was here subject to like barbarity, though able to buy out both of the principal hotels in the place. Time would fail to mention the case of worthy females who were left exposed at the Depot to insults from ruffians till a late hour in the night.

These things are truly humiliating, but such glaring facts should be known. These facts by no means indicate British feeling, nor do they indicate enlightened American feeling. The like is seldom known any where upon the American continent; and if the people of St. Catharines can tolerate such outrages, they are surely entitled to have sent them a missionary of civilization.

A Citizen.

Indignation Meeting.

A meeting of the colored citizens of St. Catharines, including the waiters at the principal hotels of the place, convened this evening at the Methodist Chapel on North Street, to take into consideration their aggrievances from certain innkeepers and their hirelings who drive their omnibusses.

The meeting was opened with prayer, after which the Rev. Nelson Countee was appointed President; Emanuel Morris, Vice-President, and David Baxter, Secretary.

The President rose and addressed the meeting, and stated the object for which it was called, viz., to take action against the cruel prejudices which deny to coloured persons, however respectable, the use of public conveyances to and from the Railroad station and the steamboat.

Mr. Dyke, the head waiter of the American Hotel, was called to express his sentiments, which he did in an appropriate manner. It was his settled determination to quit the hotel, and urged others to do the same rather than be compelled to witness such treatment as had lately occurred; that he could stand it no longer.

Mr. Morris, the head waiter of the St. Catharines House, was called on to express his sentiments, which he did in a brief but decided manner.

He said that he considered the insults and outrages heaped upon his brethren, on account of prejudice, as committed against himself. He could endure such outrages no longer; and made a stirring appeal to all present to respect themselves, and their rights as a people, and submit no longer to such degrading treatment. The head waiters were followed by quite a number of other persons, most of whom were employed at the hotels above named. The meeting was one of great harmony, and all were united in giving utterance to manly indignation towards the guilty parties who had injured and insulted them repeatedly, by excluding from conveyances persons of colour; men of the highest respectability, and in one or two instances, using violence to effect their nefarious purposes.

The following resolutions were presented, and passed unanimously; the latter more particularly, by the waiters of the two leading hotels:—

Resolved, That, in this glorious land of Freedom, and under this equitable and powerful Government, man is man, without respect to the colour of his skin, and that we, as men, will not submit to degrading terms of service, nor see our brethren treated with indignity by public conveyances, or excluded therefrom, without showing a manly spirit of resentment.

Resolved, That, as waiters, at the public hotels, of St. Catharines, we will not continue in the service of our present employers, unless, in the management of their conveyances, they henceforth treat ourselves and our people with that respect and civility, to which we are entitled, as men.

It was unanimously resolved that the proceedings of this meeting be published.

David Baxter, Secretary.

LATER FROM JAMAICA AND BARBADOES.

We have Kingston papers to the 22nd of July. The news is unimportant. The Cholera has made its appearance, but had made little progress. Up to the 7th there had been twenty deaths in Rio Bueno, where the disease was subsiding.

Much indignation was manifested in Jamaica in regard to the conduct of Captain Hollins, and the Kingston Journal of the 22nd July, states:

"We have much satisfaction in learning that a subscription has been raised in this city, headed by his Excellency the Governor, for the immediate relief of the suffering poor inhabitants of Greytown, and that an amount bordering on £100 has been already received. This sum is to be expended on the purchase of provisions to be forwarded by H. M. S. Espiegle, to sail on Sunday morning, and which, we have little doubt, will prove of material benefit."

The same paper of the 22nd says:—

"We are happy to learn that the Cholera at Barbadoes has considerably abated, particularly at Bridgtown, though not without having carried off between 11,000 and 12,000 souls. The Globe makes the mortality to be as high as 15,000, but this is denied by the West Indian, which paper is borne out by the Barbadian and Liberal.

Message

Of the President of the United States to the Senate in Executive Session, touching our Relations with Spain.

Washington, August 1.

The following message was communicated to the Senate in Executive Session this afternoon, being an answer to a resolution of inquiry offered by Senator Mason, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations:

To the Senate of the United States:

I hasten to respond briefly to the resolution of the Senate of this date, requesting the President to inform the Senate, if, in his opinion, it be not incompatible with the public interests, whether anything has arisen, since the date of his Message to the House of Representatives of the 15th of March last, concerning our relations with the Government of Spain, which, in his opinion, may dispense with the suggestions therein contained, touching the propriety of provisional measures being adopted by Congress, to meet any exigencies that may arise in the recess of Congress, affecting those relations.

In the Message to the House of Representatives referred to, I availed myself of the occasion to present the following reflections and suggestions:

In view of the position of the Island of Cuba, its proximity to our coast; the relations which it must ever bear to our Commercial and other interests, it is in vain to expect that a series of unfriendly acts, infringing on our Commercial rights, and the adoption of a policy threatening the honor and security of these States, can long consist with peaceful relations. In case the measures taken for the amiable adjustment of our difficulties with Spain should unfortunately fail, I shall not hesitate to use the authority and means which Congress may grant to insure the observance of our just rights; to obtain redress for injuries received, and to vindicate the honor of our flag. In anticipation of that contingency, which I earnestly hope may not arise, I suggest to Congress the propriety of adopting such provisional measures as the exigency may seem to demand.

The two Houses of Congress may have anticipated that the hope then expressed would be realized before the period of its adjournment, and that our relations with Spain would have assumed a satisfactory condition, so as to remove past cause of complaint, and afford better security for tranquility and justice in the future.

But, I am constrained to say that such is not the fact. The formal demand for immediate reparation in the case of the Black Warrior, instead of having been met on the part of Spain by prompt satisfaction, has only served to call forth a justification of the authorities of Cuba; and thus, to transfer the responsibility for their acts to the Spanish Government itself.

Meanwhile information, not only reliable in its nature, but of an official character, was received, to the effect that preparations was making within the limits of the United States, by private individuals under military organization for a descent upon the Island of Cuba, with a view to wrest that Colony from the dominion of Spain. International comity, the obligations of treaties, and the express provisions of law, alike require, in my judgment, that all the constitutional power of the executive should be exerted to prevent the consummation of such a violation of positive laws, and that of good faith on which mainly the amicable relations of neighboring nations must depend. In conformity with these convictions of public duty, a proclamation was issued to warn all persons not to participate in the contemplated enterprise, and to invoke the interposition in behalf of the proper officers of the Government.

No provocation whatever can justify private expeditions of hostility against a country at peace with the United States. The power to declare war, is vested by the Constitution in Congress, and the experience of our past history leaves no room to doubt that the wisdom of this arrangement of Constitutional power will continue to be verified whenever the national interest and honor shall demand a resort to ultimate measures of redress.

Pending negotiations by the Executive, and before the action of Congress, individuals could not be permitted to embarrass the operations of the one, and usurp the powers of the other of these depositories of the functions of Government.

I have only to add, that nothing has arisen since the date of my former Message to dispense with the suggestions therein contained, touching the propriety of provisional measures by Congress.

Franklin Pierce.

Ratification of the Treaty with Russia.

Washington, July 25.

The Russian treaty was ratified by the Senate to-day. It secures the neutrality of the United States in the present European war, and fully acknowledges the principle that the neutral flag protects the vessel and cargo.

☞ The United States Congress adjourned on Monday, the 7th inst., after having passed the Reciprocity Bill. The treaties ratified by the Senate, are—

The Gadsden treaty.

The British Colonial Reciprocity treaty.

The Commercial treaty with Japan.

The Neutrality treaty with Russia.

Sundry treaties, extinguishing the Indian titles in Kansas, Nebraska, and other territories.

The bills passed of most importance:

The Kansas and Nebraska bill.

The bill providing for six first-class war steamers.

The Ten Million bill of the Gadsden treaty.

The Homestead bill for Kansas and Nebraska.

The bill extending the warehousing system.

The bill to give effect to the Canadian Reciprocity treaty.

The Fortification bill.—Globe.

In Trouble.—Officer Tyler, yesterday, succeeded in arresting a free negro named David Robertson, charged with having visited a free State and returned to Virginia, in violation of law. He has been employed on the steamer Roanoke, and will undergo an examination before the Mayor this morning.—Richmond, Va. Dispatch

Immense Cattle Freight.—On Tuesday, upwards of an hundred cars freighted with 1,200 or 1,800 cattle, and ten or twelve with sheep and swine, making one hundred and twenty-two in all, passed over the Western Railroad from Albany to Brighton. This we believe is the largest cattle freight ever taken to that market in a single batch by railroad.—Albany Express.

Death of Samuel Lewis, of Ohio.—The Cincinnati papers announce the death of Samuel Lewis, the veteran abolitionist, (the Free Soil candidate for Governor of Ohio last year, when he received a very heavy vote,) one of the most magnetic and eloquent orators that ever electrified a popular audience, arduous and indefatigable in his labors—also a zealous and most efficient advocate of the temperance movement, the cause of education, &c., &c.—a self-made, and in many respects a remarkable man. His death has unquestionably been hastened by his unwearied efforts in behalf of oppressed and degraded humanity. He died at his residence, near Cincinnati, on Friday evening last.

Horrible Death.—A negro man named Jesse Clayton, employed in the ship yard of Messrs. Meads & Horney, whilst sharpening a saw, yesterday afternoon, the tressels which supported the log upon which he had been at work gave way, and the log fell with such force on his head that he was driven against the saw, his neck coming in contact with it, by which his head was nearly severed from the body. The wounded man survived but about fifteen minutes.—Baltimore Argus, July 11.

Glass in a Finger Fourteen Years.—A lady in this city, wife of Henry Wilcox, Esq., about fourteen years since, accidentally stuck a piece of glass, about one-quarter of an inch in length, into one of her fingers. A few days ago it voluntarily ejected itself, much to her relief, as it has been the cause of much trouble during the whole time it has been lodged there.—New Bedford Standard.

There has been a fugitive slave excitement at La Salle, Ill. Some Missourians attempted to arrest two runaway negroes who were provided with free papers. They were rescued, and entertained at a hotel. Several pistols were fired, blows exchanged, and brickbats brought into requisition. One of the pursuers was struck to the ground by a stone, but no one was seriously injured.

The Cincinnati Gazette of Tuesday, says: Two negro women, one mullatto girl, one negro man, and two black boys, slaves belonging to Squire Beall, of Covington, escaped from their servitude on Thursday night last, crossing the suspension bridge to Newport, thence to Ohio. They have not yet been captured.

Sale of Negroes.—Three slaves were sold in Abingdon a few days since as follows: A negro woman 36 or more years old, brought $780; a negro boy, 7 or 8 years old, brought $700; and a negro boy child, only 4 years old, brought $330.—Richmond, Va. Dispatch.

Chester Co. Alms House.—A disease resembling cholera broke out at the Chester Alms House week before last, and is still raging. Some forty of the inmates had died last Friday, and we learn from the West Chester Register, that some dozen more were sick. The disease is attributed to the general neglect by the Directors of those sanitary measures which should never be neglected at such an institution, especially in a sickly season.—Olive Branch.

Getting High.—A free negro named Beverly Robinson was captured and caged by officer Johnson, yesterday, charged with being engaged in a fight in the street, and with throwing stones at a white man. If the charge is sustained this morning, Beverly will be taught a lesson not soon to be forgotten.—Richmond (Va.) Despatch.

Provincial.

"This Canada."

"Emigrants, and those intending to emigrate from the rural districts of the old country, will find in Western Canada vast tracts of valuable land not yet taken up; and which can be obtained on very favourable terms. Sales of Crown Lands are made subject to actual settlement, and are sold at prices ranging from fifty cents (two shillings sterling) to two dollars. One-tenth of the price is required to be paid at the date of sale; the balance to be paid within ten years, in equal annual instalments, with interest at the rate of six per cent. Large tracts of the best lands in the Province are now open to purchasers on these terms. The Crown Lands have all been surveyed and divided into 200 acre lots with allowances for roads 66 feet wide, running parallel and at right angles—affording a public highway on the front and at the rear of each lot.—International Journal.

Celebration.—Yesterday being the nineteenth Anniversary day of the Negro Emancipation, a large and respectable body of colored men paraded the streets, accompanied by two brass bands, one of which was Mr. Scott's excellent cornet band. The persons forming the procession were well attired, and certainly we have seldom seen a finer body of men. They repaired to the Cathedral, where a sermon was preached, and from thence to the Government Grounds, where they partook of a good dinner. A Soiree was held in the evening. Everything passed off quietly, and, we trust, satisfactorily to all concerned.—North American.

Robbery of an Old Man.—A fine old man named Timms, whose head is bleached with upwards of 86 summers, was robbed on Tuesday last of the sum of $145, in the boarding house of Mr. William Reeves, on Queen Street. On the day named, Mr. Timms repaired to his box to recruit his pocket with a little cash, and to his great surprise, found that out of $200 but $55 remained. Suspicion was attached to a fellow-boarder named Crawley, whose hair can almost vie in whiteness with Timms, and he was arrested. Nearly all the missing money was found in Crawley's possession, and the matter will be brought before the Police Magistrate this morning to undergo investigation. Before Crawley was arrested, he went to Timms in the most hypocritical manner and sympathised with him for the loss of his money, saying that it was well that the heartless scoundrel "had left any money at all in the box." Crawley has been formally committed.—Globe.

The Colored population of Toronto had a great gathering on the first of August, to celebrate the emancipation of the negroes in the West Indian Islands. We are glad to read that they passed an address to our gracious Queen, assuring her of their loyalty, and gratitude for the boon of freedom. Canadians, red-men, and colored men, (the whole population of Canada,) have within the last three months addressed the Throne, with expressions of loyal attachment to the Queen and Constitution of Great Britain.—Old Countryman.

☞ A man named Gould, while engaged in raising a stone to the top of the new Mechanics' Institute building, Montreal, was precipitated to the ground, by the woodwork, supporting the crane, giving way, on Tuesday last. The crane and stone also fell, and striking him on the head, caused his death immediately.

Kingston, August 9th, 1854.

Yesterday evening about 7 o'clock, a most atrocious murder was committed with an axe in the hands of a negro man, on a woman named Horan, residing on Division Street. The negro was immediately arrested and brought to the Station House.

We regret to state that the railway station on the Great Western line, at St. George, in south Dumfries was destroyed by fire yesterday, (Thursday) morning, and that the new engine, the Jupiter, one of the most powerful and efficient on the line, which was intended for the Galt Branch, was destroyed, together with a number of cars intended for the same Branch. We have no account of the origin of the fire; but the Jupiter, thus destroyed, was expected in Galt with a load of iron to complete the laying of the track.—Galt Reporter.

F. B. Beddome offers for sale a valuable farm also 2½ miles from London, parts of Lot No. 1, 2d Concession of Lobo; also wild lands, lot 3, 1st concession, four miles from the town.

Poetry.

Country Home.

Oh! give mē a home in the country wide
When the earth comes out as a blushing bride,
With her buds and flowers,
In the bright spring hours,
Her bridal song ringing, from fresh leaved trees,
And melody floats on the perfumed breeze.

In summer, a seat in a shady nook,
And close by the side of a cooling brook,
Where the violet grows,
Or the pale swamp rose,
Fainting and sick 'neath the sun's scorching beam
Dips her fair petals in the cooling stream.

Oh! give me a home in the country wide,
In the golden days of the farmer's pride,
When his barns are filled,
From the field he's tilled.
And he feels that his yearly task is done,
Smiling at winter, he beckons him on.

Oh! give me a home in the country wide,
And a seat by the farmer's wood fireside,
Where the fire burns bright,
On a frosty night;
Where the jest and the song and laugh are free:
Oh! the farmer's home is the home for me.

FARMER'S DAUGHTER.

In the Meadows.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

I lie in the summer meadows,
In the meadows all alone,
With the infinite sky above me,
And the sun on his mid-day throne.

The smell of the flowering grasses
Is sweeter than any rose,
And a million of happy insects
Sing in the warm repose.

The mother lark, that is brooding,
Feels the sun on her wings,
And the deeps of the noonday glitter
With swarms of fairy things.

From the billowy green beneath me,
To the fathomless blue above,
The creatures of God are happy
In the warmth of their summer love.

The infinite bliss of Nature
I feel in every vein;
The light and the life of summer
Blossom in heart and brain.

But, darker than any shadow
By thunder clouds unfurled,
The awful truth arises,
That Death is in the world.

And the sky may beam as ever,
And never a cloud be curled,
And the airs be living odors,
But death is in the world.

Out of the deeps of sunshine
The invisible bolt is hurled;
There's life in the summer meadows,
But Death is in the world!

Agricultural.

Covered and Uncovered Manure.

EXPERIMENTS BY LORD KINNAIRD, ENGLAND, WITH COVERED AND UNCOVERED MANURE:

With Uncovered Manure.

		tons	cwt.	lbs.
1st. measurement—	1 acre produced	7	6	8	potatoes
2nd.	do 1 do	do	7	19	99

With Covered Manure.

		tons	cwts.	lbs.
1st. measurement—	1 acre produced	11	16	26	potatoes
2nd.	do 1 do	do	11	12	56

As soon as possible after the potatoes were harvested, the field was cleansed, ploughed and wheat drilled in; at the rate of three bushels per acre. As soon as the weather was suitable in the spring, the whole field got a dressing of 3 cwt. of Peruvian guano per acre.—During the winter very little difference was apparent; but shortly after the application of the guano, the wheat on that portion manured by the covered dung, took a decided lead, which it retained all summer. The whole field was cut on the 26th of August, 1852; the portion manured by the uncovered dung being at least four days earlier than the other. As before, the two seperate portions in each half of the field, were measured, cut and stocked separately. On the fourth of Sept., each portion was threshed, the grain carefully measured, and the straw weighed. On account of a wet season the grain was lighter than usual, in Great Britain, per bushel. The result of the experiment was as follows:

With Uncovered Manure.

	Produce in grain. acre.	bush.	lbs.	Weight per bushel. lbs.	Produce in straw stones	lbs.
1st.	41	19		61½	152 of 22
2nd.	42	33		do.	160 do.

With Covered Manure.

1st.	55	5	61	220 of 15
2nd.	53	53	47	210 do

These and similar experiment shave satisfied Lord Kinnaird of the advantages to be derived from having farm-yard manures put under cover. They seem so conclusive and instructive on this point as to deserve to be brought before the farming classes of this country. Not a few of our readers, we doubt not, will take measures of some kind to profit by them. It will require but a few minutes to determine the probable profits of protecting any certain amount of yard-manure. It appears from the above results that Lord Kinnaird got about 125 bushels of wheat more from the 10 acre manured from the covered dung, than from the 10 acres which had been manured with the uncovered. In wheat alone, then, without taking potatoes or wheat straw into account, the difference in favour of covered manures was quite considerable.

This would seem to render it evident that manures are subjected to great loss of fertilizing power by exposure to heats and and storms. The experience here given does not note the extent of the exposure.—Olive Branch.

Variety of Food Necessary.

It is in vegetables as in animal life; a mother crams the child exclusively with arrow root—it becomes fat, it is true, but alas! it is rickety, and gets its teeth very slowly, and with difficulty. Mamma is ignorant, or never thinks that her offspring cannot make bone—or, what is the same thing, phosphate of lime, the principle bulk of bone—out of starch, It does its best; and were it not for a little milk and bread perhaps now and then a little meal soup, it would have no teeth and bones at all. Farmers keep poultry; at what is true of fowls is true of cabbage, a turnip or an ear of wheat. If we mix with the food of fouls a sufficient quantity of egg-shells or chalk, which they eat greedily, they will lay many more eggs than before. A well-bred fowl is disposed to lay a vast number of eggs, but cannot do so without the material for the shells, however nourishing her food may be in other respects. A fowl with the best will in the world, not finding any lime in the soil, nor mortar from walls, nor calcareous matter in her food, is incapacited from laying any eggs. Let farmers lay such facts as these, which are matters of common observation, to heart, and transfer the analogy, as they may do, to the habits of plants, which are as truly alive, and answer as closely to judicious treatment, as their own horses.—Olive Branch.

Gleanings.

Glorious Uncertainty of the Law—Buttoning up a Tailor.

The "glorious uncertainty" of the law is proverbial, a striking instance of which occurred the other day in the County Court of Marylebone, where an unfortunate tailor sought to recover the sum of £9 for clothes furnished to an ingenious customer. Tailors, more, perhaps, than any other tradesmen, are victims of knavery, at the mercy of accomplished sharpers, who ply their calling more effectually when they have a well made coat on their backs which has never been paid for.

In the case to which we refer, the unfortunate tailor imagined, no doubt that he had "grounds of action," for he had executed the order and delivered the goods.—Poor, misguided man! He knew nothing of the working of that "glorious constitution" under which he lives—nothing of the operation of those statutes, every one of which by a fiction of law, he is presumed to be acquainted with. When he had proved his case as he foolishly supposed, he was asked the kind of buttons which he had placed on the garments for the amount of which he sued. He answered without hesitation, "cloth buttons." The Judge eyed the defendant's lawyer with surprise.

"Pray, what has such a question to do with the case?" "Very much," was the pert rejoinder, "as I shall presently show;" and accordingly the learned gentleman, to the astonishment of every one—certainly to the astonishment of the unfortunate tailor, began to quote acts of William III, acts of Queen Anne and acts of George I, giving in each case chapter and verse with the most cool and unblushing precision, proving that the making of "cloth buttons" was decidedly illegal, and that the unhappy plaintiff, so far from being in a position to recover his just debt, had not only forfeited his claim, but had rendered himself liable to heavy penalties for making his buttons of cloth, when they ought to have been made of brass!

"It is here enacted," said this accomplished legal excavator, "that no person in England shall make, sell, or sew on any clothes buttons or button-holes made or bound with cloth, serge, camlets, or druggets, or any other stuff, under a penalty of forty shillings for every dozen buttons so made; and the provisions further direct that no person can recover for clothes made without brass buttons." At the close of this notable speech a roar of laughter, according to the report, proceeded from the persons who were in the court. Everybody laughed but the poor tailor. For him these absurd statutes, so glibly quoted, were no laughing matters. The Judge found that these acts, which had been passed to encourage the Birmingham button trade in the good old days of protection, had never been repealed; and the result was that the tailor was non-suited, and impudently told by the man who had cheated him that he would be proceeded against for the recovery of penalties specified in the acts.

Now, considering how much this country pays to lawyers, will any one hesitate to say that this is not a disgraceful state of things? We have fifteen judges who absorb little less than £100,000 per annum; we have the Lord Chancellor, whose income is not less than an eighth part of that sum; we have Vice-Chancellors, lord justices, master of the rolls, attorney and solicitor-generals, all drawing immense sums from the public, and it is left to some pettifogging fellow to delve up and discover the existence of acts of parliament which prevent a numerous class of tradesmen from recovering their just debts. Some one has said of English law that it smiles in your face while it picks your pocket; but in the case of the tailors, it does worse than this—it plunders them remorselessly, and laughs with glee while it perpetrates the monstrosity.—European Times, July 15.

THE EFFECT OF GOOD COMPANY.—M. Rothschild was asked one day by a young man, an intimate friend of his family, to lend him 5,000 francs. "No, said the Baron, "I only do business now, with crowned heads; but I'll get you the money. You may walk with me, once, along the arcades of the Bourse, taking me familiarly by the arm"—The promenade was effected, and at the end of it the young man had his 5,000 francs in his pocket, and had refused offers of 50,000 more.

An American paper singing the praises of the Far West says "nearly all the suicides in this country are by foreigners. Yankees rarely make away with themselves; for nearly every one thinks he has a chance of becoming President, and, at any rate, his curiosity prompts him to live on, just to see what he will come to."

TO DESTROY VERMIN IN HOUSES.—Take up your carpets, down your curtains. In a pailful of water (cold) mix well one pound of chloride of lime (having first diluted it into a thin paste in a bowl of water, for facility of mixture,) with a mop wet and saturate well the floor, skirtings, and any other woodwork that will not suffer injury, then shut the doors and windows close. If there should be a suspicion of tenants in the bedstead, take that down too. In three or four hours all will have disappeared or perished; but to assure perfect immunity from the plague, it might be as well to repeat the lustration a second time—i. e., the day or two after.—The Builder.

GILDED SILK.—M. Pouilly, of Paris, has a galvanoplastic method of treating silk, by which gilded dress or drapery is produced of unequalled magnificence. He metalizes the silk, throws down upon it a coating of copper, and last of all a coating of gold; and so perfectly is this accomplished, that the texture, while appearing to be metallic throughout, retains all its flexibility. The richness of effect is said to be truly marvellous; and we may yet hear of a Feld of the Cloth of Gold, far surpassing that which old chroniclers tell us of.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ord nary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the unjustness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GRIBBLE, of St. Paul's East Smithfield and seconded by the Rev. THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL RINGOLD WARD respecting the destitute condition of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after suffering their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1854, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Business Relations—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plans adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches auxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 12. A member of the council shall be member of only one of the committees thereof.

Art. 13. All officers holding funds, shall give security in double the amount likely to be in their hands. This security to be given to the three first officers of the council.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper government

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. That the location of the school, which is to be within one hundred miles of the town of Erie, Pennsylvania, will be selected as soon as three thousand dollars are paid in; the school building and work-shop will be commenced as soon as ten thousand dollars are paid in; and the school commenced as soon as fifteen thousand dollars are paid in; and that in no case will a contract be made beyond the sum of money actually paid in. The site of the school will be at least two hundred acres of land, one hundred and fifty of which shall for ever be used as a farm for agricultural instruction.

2nd. In accordance with a vote of the Rochester Convention, the teachers are to be selected for, and pupils admitted into, the school without reference to sex or complexion.

3d. Special provision will be made to make this, from the beginning, an industrial school for females as well as males; a prominent principle of conduct will be to aid in providing for the female sex, methods and means of enjoying an independent and honorable livlihood.

FREDERICK DOUGLASS,
JOHN D. PECK,
AMOS G. BEMAN,
JOHN JONES,
J. D. BONNER,
J. MCCUNE SMITH,
Committee on Manual Labour School.

1. The title shall be "THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL."

2. The foundation fund shall be thirty thousand dollars.

3. Twenty thousand dollars shall be in stock of 2000 shares, at ten dollars per share.

4. Ten thousand dollars shall be in donations to be solicited from the friends of the cause.

5. The shares shall be payable, ten per cent. at the time of subscribing, and ten per cent. every first day of July, October, January and April thereafter, until the whole is paid in.

6. The School shall be organised and conducted entirely by a board of fifteen trustees.

7. Six of these trustees shall be the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the People of Color; and nine of the trustees shall be elected by the Stockholders when three thousand dollars shall have been paid in by them, (the stockholders) and annually thereafter. Each share of stock shall count as one vote at all such elections. And stockholders may vote by proxy, on affidavit made and acknowledged before a Commissioner of Deeds.

8. In organizing the School the following regulations shall be strictly enforced:

a. For every branch of Literature taught, there shall be one branch of handicraft also taught in the School.

b. Each pupil shall occupy one half his time when at School, in work at some handicraft, or on the farm

c. The hand terms shall be such that their products will be at all times saleable for cash, or money's worth, at a market within easy access from the School.

The agent appointed by the Committee Frederick Douglass, Esq., shall be empowered to receive donations and take subscriptions for stock, giving a receipt for the latter, signed by himself and Rev. Amos G. Beman, the Secretary of the Committee. As soon as, and as often as the Agent aforesaid shall receive two hundred and fifty dollars, either in subscriptions or donations, he shall pay the same over to the Treasurer, John Jones, Esq., of Chicago, who shall deposit the same forthwith, in the Bank of America, Chicago, Ill.: the Treasurer aforesaid, as soon as he shall receive one thousand dollars, and for every thousand dollars thereafter, shall give bonds with two sureties to the President and Secretary of the National Council of Colored People, for double the amounts aforesaid. For his services, the Agent shall receive five per cent. on all stock instalments paid in by him, and ten per cent. on all donations above two hundred dollars paid in by or through him.

10. The members of the Committee on Manual Labor School shall also be empowered to receive donations for the same; and they shall transmit all said donations to the Treasurer, by draft, within ten days after receiving the same. They shall also be entitled to five per cent. on all such donations paid in by him.

11. The Treasurer shall publish at least once a fortnight a list of all the donations and subscriptions of stock received by him; and shall transmit to each donor or stockholder, a copy of the paper, (Frederick Douglass' Paper or Aliened American,) which shall contain the acknowledgment of their gift or subscription.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DISTINCTIVE OBJECT:

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church-Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength his positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the development of the TRIBUNE'S Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence soliciting the names of Subscribers. Two books—the Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all other communications for the Paper to be sent, post-paid, marked Money, (if inclosed) and addressed, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

CALL FOR A NATIONAL EMIGRATION CONVENTION OF COLORED MEN,

To be held in Cleveland, Ohio, on the 24th, 25th and 26th of August, 1854.

MEN AND BRETHREN:—The time has now fully come, when we, as an oppressed people, should do something effectively, and use those means adequate to the attainment of the great and long desired end—to do something to meet the actual demands of the present and prospective necessities of the rising generation of our people in this country. To do this, we must occupy a position of entire equality, of unrestricted rights, composing in fact, an acknowledged necessary part of the [illegible] of society in which we live. To secure an essential improvement of this element in [illegible], it ever we expect the enjoyment of free [illegible], and equality of rights anywhere. For this purpose, and to this end, then, all colored men in favor of emigration out of the United States, and opposed to the American Colonization scheme of leaving the Western Hemisphere, are requested to meet in CLEVELAND, OHIO, on TUESDAY, the 24th DAY of AUGUST, 1854, in a great NATIONAL CONVENTION, then and there, to consider and decide upon the great and important subject of emigration from the United States.

No person will be admitted to a seat in the Convention, who would introduce the subject of emigration to the Eastern Hemisphere—either to Asia, Africa, or Europe—as our object and determination is to consider our claims to the West Indies, Central and South America, and the Canadas. This restriction has no reference to personal preference, or individual enterprise; but to the great question of national claims to come before the Convention.

All persons coming to the Convention must bring credentials properly authenticated, or bring verbal assurance to the Committee on Credentials—appointed for the purpose—of their fidelity to the measures as they exist in the Call, as the Convention is specifically brought for the friends of emigration, and NONE OTHERS and no opposition to them will be encouraged.

The question is not whether our condition can be bettered by emigration, but whether it can be made worse. If not, then, there is no part of the wide-spread universe, where our social and political condition are not better than here in our native country, and nowhere in the world as here proscribed on account of color.

We are friends, too, and ever will stand shoulder to shoulder by our brethren, and all our friends in all good measures adopted by them for the bettering of our condition in this country, and surrender no rights but with our last breath; but as the subject of emigration is of vital importance, and has ever been shunned by all delegated assemblages of our people as heretofore met, we cannot longer delay, and will not be further baffled; and deny the right of our most sanguine friend or dearest brother, to prevent an intelligent enquiry to, and the carrying out of these measures, when this can be done, to our entire advantage as we propose to show in Convention—as the West Indies, Central and South America—the majority of which are peopled by our brethren, or those identified with us in race, and what is more, destiny, on this continent—all stand with open arms and yearning hearts, importuning us in the name of suffering humanity to come—to make common cause, and share one common fate on the continent.

The Convention will meet without fail, at the time fixed for assembling, as none but those favorable to emigration are admissable; therefore no other gathering may prevent it. The number of delegates will not be restricted—except in the town where the Convention may be held—and there the number will be decided by the Convention when assembled, that they may not too far exceed the other delegations.

The time and place fixed for holding the Convention are ample; affording sufficient time, and a leisure season generally—and as Cleveland is now the centre of all directions—a good and favorable opportunity to all who desire to attend.—Therefore, it may reasonably be the greatest gathering of the colored people ever before assembled in a Convention in the United States.

Colonizationists are advised, that no favors will be shown to them or their expatriating scheme, as we have no sympathy with the enemies of our race.

All colored men, East, West, North and South, favorable to the measures set forth in this Call will send in their names (post-paid) to M. R Delany, or Rev. Wm. Webb, Pittsburgh, Pa., that there may be arranged and attached to the Call, five names from each State.

We must make an issue, create an event, and establish a position for ourselves. It is glorious to think of, but far more glorious to carry out.

For the "Provincial Freeman."

Address to the Conductors of the "Provincial Freeman."

Toil on, toil on, ye noble few!
Such work is worthy of such hands;
Renounce the vile, applaud the true,—
Your fame shall speed in foreign lands.

For, ye like stars of purest light,
Are gazed upon by anxious eyes:
And throbbing hearts, in "black and white"—
In frames of every hue and size.

Breathe prayers to Fate, to move the wheels
Of Reason, Love and Knowledge on,
'Till Justice's auditory peals,
Proclaims abroad "the work is done."

A ray of light shall strike those eyes,
Which gaze upon [illegible] shade
Each ear shall catch the piercing sighs,
That by your generous hearts are made.

And each shall feel, by duty bound,
To help to move the mighty car:
Applaud your cause, fair in the sound,
And swell [illegible] bar!

The [illegible] "[illegible]" sand
A myriad [illegible] of lively souls
Then prejudice with baneful guile,
Must die, as progress onward rolls.

Then let us pray, that from their sleep,
The living stupors may awake,
And [illegible]
The blazing chain [illegible]

And climb the hill of honored worth;
Ascend the top of dazzling fame;
Then grateful of another birth—
Inscribe thereon a deathless name!

The Solitary Alpine Traveller.

An English tourist, who wished to make the ascent of Mont St. Bernard alone, thus speaks of his journey in a communication to Eliza Cook's Journal:

Some of my friends in England had strongly urged me not to attempt the St. Bernard without a guide, because of the danger. Experience has, however, taught me that the services of a guide are needed less often than most people imagine, and I like to be alone. On this mountain, too, you can not go wrong; you have only to follow the road, which is an excellent one as far as St. Pierre, and is practicable for cars to within two hours of the hospice.

The road makes a sudden plunge in the forest of St. Pierre, and is so rugged and tortuous, that you see at once why this portion of the route gave more trouble and loss to Bonaparte in his celebrated passage than all the rest. The skeletons of unhappy Frenchmen are still sometimes discovered in crevices of the rocks.

Beyond St Pierre you leave the valley and the pine trees behind, and come upon a broad level of Alpine pasture, abounding as usual in flowers, and enlivened by the bells of the numerous grazing kine. Here the rhododendron grows in profusion. At the end of the pastures stands a big white house, known as the Cantine, often used by travellers who arrive late or are caught in a storm. Here the car road terminates, and the hardest work of climbing begins.

The sky, which lower down I had found rather too clear, became overcast, and the large, heavy precursor drops of a thundershower began to fall as I commenced the ascent of the rocks which rise black and steep from the verge of the soft green turf. The rugged path follows the windings of the Dranse, here diminished to a noisy brook, as it frets and foams in a tortuous course among the splintered masses of granite that here upheave their grey heads in savage confusion. Vegetation becomes scantier at every step, and at length nothing but hardy mosses and lichens are to be seen.

Owing to the general backwardness of the season, the snow had but slightly melted, and lay thick and heavy in every nook and angle not exposed to the direct rays of the sun. To the right and left stretched a waste of snow, and looking upward, the scene was still more wintry and desolate, for the snow lay not in patches, but in vast wide slopes, unbroken save by the scattered summits of the rocks. It was one of those marvellous contrasts for which Switzerland is so remarkable; and he who had not traversed the green pastures lying but a short distance below, might well doubt of their existence.

More and more sullen grew the scene as I climbed the craggy steep; heavy clouds sank lower and lower, the wind howled dismally as it swept down from the heights; the rain seemed to have made up its mind for a settled pour, and lightning flashed and thunder bellowed with a vividness and power that might well be deemed the shrieking of the spirit of the mountains against the daring intruder. The clouds were so near my head that I feared to keep my umbrella up; so, sheltering myself under some overhanging crags, I watched the sounding war. It was viewing nature in a new aspect—in the very workshop and headquarters of storms.

The clouds rolled slowly away, and in about twenty minutes the storm moderated to a fitful shower, and I again toiled onward. The walking had become more irksome than before, the rain having made stone and snow alike slippery; and when foothold fails at almost every step, the fatigue of climbing an ascent is painfully increased. Here the path began to rise again: and so frequent and exhausting were my slips, that I was compelled to stop every thirty paces to recover breath. It began to rain again; the wind howled and shrieked more dismally than before; the clouds swooped, and, so deepened the leaden gloom, that night seemed to have come. I looked at my watch—it was half-past four; so there were yet some hours to sunset. Still, the difficulty of facing the wind and rain made me doubtful of getting to the summit of the pass, and I was beginning to discuss the possibilities of a return to the Cantine, when another turn showed me the hospice.

Though still far off, the sight reanimated me; and in hope of reaching the friendly shelter, I again trudged onward. Another quarter of an hour brought me to the foot of the steepest slope of all, where the convent was no longer in view, and from which the mule tracks diverged a considerable distance to the left, while a single trail of footsteps led directly upward. I preferred to follow these as the shortest route, though I had to use my hands as well as my feet to secure my foothold. In this way I had mounted about one-third of the height when another storm-burst, compared with the first which was a zephyr. The rain fell in spouts and streams dashing like a shadowy river down the snow, hissing as it went, intermingled with hail that beat mercilessly upon me, for keeping my umberella up was out of the question.

Now the lightning flashed again and the thunder roared; and so deadly chill were the blasts, that I was speedily benumbed as well as drenched, and, for the first time in my life, knew what it was to be cold to the bones. Every time I bent forward to dig my hands into the snow, the rain ran down my back, till I shuddered at its freezing propensities. The case seemed growing desperate, when I spied some rocks on the left, and made toward them for the sake of a firm footing for a few minutes. No sooner had I reached them, than a strange giddiness seized me, and I fell down in a half unconscious state, and lay for a time until the pelting of the storm roused me again, to hear thunder roaring at my ears, rolling round and round, and even under me.

I could not help looking; the clouds lay close upon the rocks, leaving no room for the lightning to dart downward, and it seemed to me that a lurid fire flashed through them from time to time in a horizontal direction, and tore them asunder as it passed. Would there be no danger in standing upright? Whether or no if I did not make an attempt to go on, the increasing would soon incapacitate me altogether. I rose to my feet, and erewhile gazing at the hill or on the rock, when the giddiness again seized me, and there came over me a sense or a sullen pleasure at the pelting of the rain, and indifference to the result. Minutes are long under such circumstances, and three or four minutes may have passed, when almost involuntarily I started up, looked around, and shouted. No answer came but mocking echoes; the shout had disheartened me; it seemed a confession of weakness.

However, I saw dimly through the rock a large black cross on the top of the slope; if that could be reached, there would be a hope of seeing the convent; so mustering all my strength, I succeeded in climbing up to it, and putting my arm around it, I wiped my eyes for a fresh survey. Heaven be praised! there is the convent, and nearer than I thought. Between me and it lay an untrodden bank of snow in the hollows of the rock. It was deep and might be treacherous; but I had become desperate, and rushed across it laughing and shouting under some wild, uncontrollable impulse to the open door of the hospitable building. How I did it without falling has been ever since a mystery to me; but it was done. I leaped up the steps, and in another moment was in the long passage which runs from one end of the edifice to the other, and in safety. If ever a heartfelt thanksgiving was offered to St. Bernard, it was on that occasion.

The Circassians among their Mountains.

A correspondent of the London Times gives this interesting account of his visit to the valley of the Caucasus, in company with Admiral Sir E. Lyon.

"A few miles beyond Golovinsky, says the writer, the Admiral stood close to the shore and anchored; the rest of the fleet did the same. Two Turkish trading boats from Trebizonde were high and dry on the beach, and hundreds of Circassians formed a picturesque crowd (nearly all being mounted) by the seashore. This point is named Bardan, and here the Russians have perseveringly tried to get a footing, and as often being foiled by the Circassian rifles, the owners of which are not a little proud of the frequent repulsions of Moskov. Bardan has therefore been the only Circassian post, and from this place the young ladies have for years been eligibly settled in the harems of the great men of Stamboul. From this place Captain Brook and the engineer officer started over the mountains with a few Sappers and an escort of Circassians, commanded by Ismail Bey, to cross the Russian road by hook or by crook, and to communicate with Schamyl, if possible. As soon as we landed we were surrounded by a crowd of Circassians, who immediately led us by a path from the shore, through woods, brambles, and ditches, to a long field, surrounded by woods, among which several wooden dwellings showed their roofs. This was a beautiful spot, and the grass beneath us a mass of daisies and buttercups. A renewal of acquaintance with these was not the least pleasant part of our trip. A Circassian made me mount his horse. Crossing a stream, I gave it up again, and prepared, with a guide, to scale one of the mountain heights. We had a heavy pull up this hill, on a narrow pathway covered with briar and brambles. On our way we met two Circassian young ladies, rather moon-faced, but with beautiful complexions and pleasant expression. Our Circassian friend called to them to cover their faces (we had a dragoman with us)—an order which the young ladies showed their good sense by neglecting. At the top we had a most noble view, a complete panorama of rich wood, overtopped with snow; several villages were dotted among the woods and upon the mountain sides, the dwellings being all of wood. We descended by another mountain path to the sea; here we took another stroll, and entered a wood. We had been advised not to stray too far, as the Circassians of the mountains were ignorant of our arrival, and might take us for Russians. In the wood we met a fine-looking old gentleman, mounted, and proceeding slowly; with him were two Circassian girls, his daughters, as it appeared. Not knowing what to make of us, he drew his sword, or rather hog-knife, and looked fierce; but on nearing us, and seeing we were unarmed, returned it again, and was quite happy when he knew us to be 'Inghealeez.' Then his daughters came forward and shook hands with all.—One was about twelve years old, the other fourteen, the latter exceedingly pretty, with a fair skin, blue eyes, and light hair, and we were told by the old gentleman they were ready and happy to become a portion of the personal effects of any of us for 10,000 piastres (£80). These Circassian girls looked forward to this, as being settled in life and going to Stamboul is a fulfilment of their best wishes and desires, just as a young lady in London makes an 'eligible' match. Our little friend with the blue eyes looked at us earnestly, in confirmation of papa's words, and made some of our party a present of shells she had just picked up, which she pantomined would bear a fine polish; but a Circassian girl here and at Stamboul are two very different beings. At home she wanders about in plain and rough dress, only dreaming of the gold and decoration that may some day fall to her lot at Stamboul. They are generally educated in Turkish young lady-like accomplishments, music, &c., and imbibe by degrees the artificial life they must lead henceforth. No Turk can marry, unless he provide his wife or wives with all manner of ornaments and luxury, and hence a decrease in the population which would greatly gratify Mr. Malthus.—As the Turks of the lower orders die at Stamboul, their place is mostly filled by fresh arrivals from Asia. The two Turkish trading vessels fired an eccentric salute as the ships arrived and departed. A French schooner had arrived to export a freight of the same nature as the little blue-eyed girl I told you of; each ship would hold 200 of them. On descending the mountain we saw a number of Circassian women looking from among the brushwood at the ships; directly we appeared they dipped among the brushwood like so many specimens of 'Jack-in-the-box.' I cannot account for such excessive delicacy on their part, except, perhaps, by their being the wives of some of the warriors on the beach, who perhaps, were very jealous fellows. We took three of these people off in our boat, and numerous were their expressions of astonishment and 'Mashallahs' on seeing the ship and its contents. A book with views of Stamboul particularly elicited their admiration, but at the sight of a revolver and its six successive explosions of caps, came a Mash'Allah, Mash'Allah, and a burst of laughter. On seeing an engraving of the Greek Slave, the old gentleman laughed and put his hands before his eyes like the most sensitive of American ladies. They ate bread and salt (the latter is most valuable among them), and took back with them some charges of powder. Before coming off I noticed a mark of delicate feeling on the part of one of them. Seeing we were unarmed, he took off his pistols, knives, and sabre, and, unslinging his rifle, insisted on leaving them on shore behind him. When the Admiral went on shore, he was at once recognized, and received as a prince; and, on leaving, the whole of the hundreds of rifles were discharged at once by their owners.

"The Circassians are a remarkable good-looking race—tall and well-made, and generally fair, some even of the older warriors having quite pink cheeks; and, odd enough, when one considers their roaming life, their feet and hands are remarkably small. They cut their skin shoes to fit the foot exactly.—In dress they carry a huge affair on the head, of the calpac species; a high cone of yellow cloth rises from a forest of fur which encircles the head; their coats are principally made of a woolen fabric, and reach far below the knee. The higher orders have this of brilliant yellow cloth; round the throat a linen under-garment buttons exactly, and over this is frequently worn a smart silk affair, showing between the folds of the coat. In their breasts they carry about a score of bone or ivory cases, filled with loose powder, having the ball at the top. Some of the better sort wear smart scarlet leggins and yellow or red slippers; round the waist of all are fastened multitudinous knives and pistols, upon a leather belt; and slung over the shoulder, in a cloth case, the rifle. They look altogether like a set of aristocratic savages."

The polluted libertine, with foul lips, back-eyed heart, but polished manners, finds smiling welcome at the beauteous lips of virtue; while, from the brow on which that libertine has ineffaceably written "Magdalen," "beauteous Virtue" turns scornfully away.

The last words of Napoleon to Sir Hudson Lowe.

Having received an intimation from Captain Poppleton, the orderly officer attached to Longwood House that General Bonaparte had not been visible the day before, but that either he or Dr. O'Meara would certainly endeavour to see him in the course of the evening, to be enabled to make his report as usual to me, I immediately repaired to Longwood, in order to prevent any unpleasant intrusion on him, however warranted by the instructions given to the orderly officer, which require that he should either see General Bonaparte twice during the day, or ascertain his being on the spot, and report accordingly. I met General Montholon at the door of the house, asked how General Bonaparte was and, on being told he was indisposed and suffering, said I wished to offer him the assistance of a medical officer, but begged him to wait on General Bonaparte and acquaint him I was there, imagining, as it was after four o'clock, when he usually received people, he would probably see me. General Montholon went in, and returned shortly afterwards, saying General Bonaparte would see me. I passed through his dining room, drawing room, another room in which were displayed a great number of maps and plans laid out on a table, and several loose quires of writings, apparently memoirs and extracts, and was introduced into an inner apartment, with a bed in it and a couch, on which latter Bonaparte was reclining, having only his dressing gown on, and without his shoes. He raised himself up a little as I entered the room, and, pointing out a chair to me close to the couch, desired I would sit down. I seated myself, and commenced the conversation by saying I was sorry to hear he was suffering from indisposition, and had come to offer him the assistance of a medical officer of respectability who had come out with me from England, that he might have the benefit of his advice as well as that of Dr. O'Meara, should he require it. "I want no doctors," was his reply. He then, after some indifferent questions, asked me whether the wife of Sir George Bingham had arrived? She had not arrived, I replied: and I had reason to regret, on another account, the Adamant transport had not yet come in, as she was laden with several articles that might be useful to him, such as wines, clothes, furniture, &c. He said it was all owing to the want of a Chronometer; that it was a miserable piece of economy on the part of our Admiralty not to give every vessel above 200 tons a chronometer—he had caused it to be done in France; that, exclusive of the value of the ship, the lives of the persons in it merited that consideration. I said they were not vessels employed under the direction of the Admiralty, but of another board. This made no difference, he said. After some other general and unimportant questions, a short interval of silence ensued. He lay reclined on his couch, his eyes cast down, apparently suffering a good deal from an oppression in his breathing (which had been particularly observable, so as to cause an occasional interruption to his voice whilst in discource,) and his countenance usually sallow and even bloated. He recovered himself after a little while to ask me what was the situation of affairs in France at the time I left Europe? I said, everything, I believed, was settled there. Beauchamp's "Campaign of 1814" was lying on the floor near him. He asked me if it was me who had written the letters referred to in the appendix to this work. I replied, "Yes." "I recollect Marshal Blucher at Lubeck," he said: "is he not very old?"—"Seventy-five years," I replied, "but still vigourous, supporting himself on horseback for sixteen hours in the day, when circumstances render it necessary." He sat reflecting a few moments without any observation. He resumed: "The Allies have made a convention declaring me their prisoner: what do they mean? They have not authority to do so (ni en droit ni en fait.) I wish you to write to your Government and acquaint it that I shall protest against it. I gave myself up to England and to no other Power. It is an act of the British Parliament alone which can warrant the proceedings against me. I have been treated in a cruel manner. I misunderstood the character of the English people. I should have surrendered myself to the Emperor of Russia, who was my friend, or to the Emperor of Austria, who was related to me. There is courage in putting a man to death, but it is an act of cowardice to let him languish, and to poison him in so horrid an island and in so detestable a climate." I said the island of St. Helena had never been regarded in that light; that, except so far as related to the precautions necessary for his personal security, it had been the desire of the British Government to render his situation as comfortable as possible; that the house, furniture, and effects of every kind coming out for his use, certainly indicated as much regard as it was possible to show him consistant with the main object for which this place of residence had been selected. "Let them send me a coffin; a couple of balls in the head is all that is necessary. What does it signify to me whether I lie on a velvet couch or on fustian? I am a soldier, and accustomed to everything. I have been landed here like a convict, and proclamations forbid the inhabitants to speak to me"—attributing a great deal of all this to the Admiral; but concluded with saying, "It is not that the Admiral is a bad man." The conversation then turned on the localities of Longwood House. He inveighed bitterly against it; said he was excluded from all communication with the inhabitants; that many persons in the town would willingly come to see him, but they were afraid to ask for passes; that he had no trees about him; that this alone rendered the spot detestable; that he could not ride to any extent; that he wished to have a greater range for his excercise without being accompanied by an officer; that unless I gave him a greater range I could do nothing for him. I told him the range of Longwood was greater than any other piece of ground on the island. He said perhaps so; but that there was the camp on part of it. He did not want to see the camp always; he could not ride where that was. He wished the people of the island might be allowed to come and see him. He recurred frequently to the hardship there was in depriving him of all intercourse with them. His addresses to me on this point were bumble and artful; they obtained no assent from me. He spoke of my having insisted on seeing his servants; that it was a strange thing to interfere between a man and his valet de chambre; that personally seeing and examining the servants after having received their declaration was as much as to say, "in good French, that they had lied." I told him "it was Count Bertrand's fault. I had pointed out to him the way in which I intended to receive their declaration; he wished it to be otherwise, but I had insisted upon receiving it in the manner I had indicated."—"Ah! this is now over," he replied. He said he would recommend to the four who had signed their declaration to leave him whenever he found his situation more precisely defined, and should make application for their being permitted to do so. He said, "Repeat everything I have mentioned to you to your Government. I wish them to know my sentiments." On going away, I again offered him medical assistance. "I want no doctors," he replied. These were the last words he addressed to me."—Captivity of Napoleon.

Letter from James G. Birney.

To the Editor of the N. Y. Tribune:

SIR:—I sometimes think that my note to you—for I took no copy of it—referred to in your remarks on Mr. Goodell's article, imperfectly expressed what I intended to say. I meant this that if our Northern people were to consider themselves limited to any object subordinate to the total extinction of Slavery, they would probably rest on that object, should it be attained. But I, by no means, intended that I would not do all I could do, fairly connected with that end—as the repeal of the Fugitive Slave act, the Trial by Jury at the place of capture, the repeal of the Nebraska and Kansas act, &c., &c. But the utter extinction of Slavery must be our ultimatum. SERVITAS DELENDA EST must be the rallying words on our banner. Why should we lop off the too-far jutting branches of an offensive thing, and not destroy the thing that is constantly producing them.

You know as well as I do that Slavery nowhere can remain stationary—that its exacerbations, as it advances, become more malignant—that the laws it required half a century ago, or even a few years ago, were much below what it now requires. Why, S., the Fugitive act—the denial of trial by Jury, except at the South, where we had supposed its good-for-nothingness could deceive no one, the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, &c., these things are no more than Slavery now requires. A short time hence it will call for more sanguinary and cruel laws. I hold it to be an impossible thing to practice a republican form of government, and at the same time admit a permanent system of Slavery, I don't care how mild it may be at the outset. If we continue to suffer Slavery among us, you may yet live to see what the old Romans had—a man, yes a MAN, Sir—chained to the door post in New York as janitor, or a fugitive slave cast into the fish pond as food for the eels.

But if Slavery go not out at once—even if it endure for a hundred years—we shall be content if its doom be sealed. But all our National action concerning it must tend to put out; it must never be seen to grow again. If we do not mean to put it out, we must inevitably lose much of the benefit of its extinction. It has brought us into our present predicament—deplorable enough, in all conscience—and we cannot return, except by its entire demolition. If we have not virtuous courage enough for this, we shall run into the most unjust extravagances, for they are the meat on which Slavery feeds. We might as well, too, rest from all useless effort and at once acknowledge that we are incapable of carrying out the true principles of Democracy—anything, indeed, but corrupt party Whiggery and Locofocoism.

No, Sir—well acquainted as I am with Slavery, and seeing the effects of it on slaveholders—as every one may see them—I am as well convinced as I can be of any such thing, that unless we extinguish it, it will extinguish what remains to us of liberty, and Mr. Goodell's prophecy, without any aid from him will come true.

Yours, very truly,
JAS. G. BIRNEY.

Lower Saginaw, (Mich.) July 10, 1854.

REMARKS.

We have not the least objection to Mr. Birney's contemplating the complete overthrow of Slavery as the end of his exertions—we also most earnestly desire to see and hope to promote that extinction. But there is nothing like a majority—of the American People who are as yet prepared to make efforts and sacrifices to sunder party ties and encounter personal hostility, in the cause of Universal Emancipation. We submit, then, that Mr. Birney's assertion, even though it were amply sustained by proof, that every man ought to be an Abolitionist, does not and cannot overrule the stern fact that a large majority of our countrymen are nothing of the sort.

But why should they seek to "lop off the too-far jutting branches of an offensive thing, and not destroy the thing itself that is continually producing them?" Were we in their stead, we might answer, "Because the tree stands on another's ground, where we have no right to cut it down, while the branches stretch over the line and shade our ground, which the owner of the tree has no right to shade. We attempt what we can do, because it is our right to do it, rather than essay what we have no right to do, and which therefore would involve us in defeat and blame if we undertook it." We cannot perceive that this answer is unreasonable.

But our answer reaches further. We say that Abolition in the States is what all men ought to strive for, and still it is clear to our mind that a large majority are not prepared for this, and the practical question is this—Shall we politically attempt what will certainly involve us in defeat and failure? or shall we not rather attempt that which a majority are ripe for, and thus, by our consequent triumph, invite that majority to go further? Shall we insist on having all the possible eggs now, or be content to await their appearance day by day? The latter seems to us the only rational sensible course. We care not how fast Messrs. Birney & Co. may ripen public sentiment in the North for Emancipation; we will aid them to the best of our ability; but we will not refuse the good now within our reach out of deference to that which is as yet unattainable.

Mr. Birney's "ultimatum" may be just what he sees fit; we have not proposed to modify or meddle with it. We only ask that he shall not interdict and prevent the doing of some good at once, merely because he would like to do more good, as we shall also whenever it shall have become practicable.

Mr. Birney says truly that Slavery is essentially aggressive—that it cannot stand still, but must always be encroaching upon Freedom! He does not intimate any hope of seeing Southern servitude abolished for some years to come. What is to be done at present, then, it seems to us, is to draw together, organize and discipline a party of Freedom,—a party animated and rendered efficient by incidental successes, preparatory to more decisive efforts. That party can never rightfully attempt the emancipation of the slaves of Virginia, Kentucky, or any other State, except through its moral influence on the sentiments and acts of the citizens of those States respectively; (and it does seem to us that Cassius M. Clay, by remaining in Kentucky, has qualified himself to act more effectively in aid of Emancipation than James G. Birney in quitting that State and removing his property and industry to one already free. But each is his own judge in the premises.)

Be it understood once for all, then, that Mr. Birney, or Mr. Goodell, or any one else, has an undoubted right to live and labour for the complete extinction of Slavery by any lawful means, and we do not assume to decide for him as to what means are and what are not lawful. We only insist that he shall not distract and paralyze present effort, for ends now attainable, by insisting that nothing shall be attempted short of universal Abolition. If we were joint owners of a field of corn, into which part of a neighbour's herd of cattle had broken, we should say, Let us drive out the cattle; next put up the fence; then see what further we shall do to guard against recurrence of the mischief. "No," reply the ultras;—"the cattle who did not get into our field are just as vicious as those who did; and we must begin by resolving that our neighbour shall no longer keep cattle, or we may as well leave them in our field and have our corn eaten up first as last." But this resolving that cattle shall not be kept, involve grave questions of power, and expediency, and preparation, which all the owners of the corn are not yet ready definately to consider; so we insist that the cattle shall be driven out first, and the other questions taken up in due order. If this be not agreed to, we foresee what the end will be—the corn will be destroyed and the breachy cattle will remain—and even increase. For that deplorable result, we hold ourselves nowise accountable, having pointed out and urged the only practicable mode of preventing it.—Tribune.

Poetry.

From Dicken's Household Words.

Miasma.

Near a cotter's door, in a murky lane,
Beneath steaming dirt and stagnant rain,
Miasma lay in a festering drain.

A bone of clay, cemented with slime,
He artfully built—for he hated lime—
'Midst slop. and rot, and want and crime,
He lay securely, biding his time.

Though a voice cried, pointing out his lair,
"Run, run, for Miasma lies hidden there!"
It died unheeded, away on the air.

Living and breathing the filth among,
Miasma's home was secure and strong,
And the cotter did nothing, for nothing went wrong.

And the children would play by the prisoner's pool,
For they liked it much better than going to school.

Then Miasma arose from his reeking bed,
And around the children his mantle spread—
"To save them from harm," Miasma said.

But they sighed a last sigh. He had stolen their breath,
And had wrapped them in Cholera's cloak of death

Tea a Preventive of Cholera.

From a pamphlet now in press, in our office, entitled "Hints to Tea Drinkers," compiled by Messrs. L. F. Harter & Co., tea dealers, Woodward Avenue, four doors north of Jefferson Avenue, we extract the following:

"An intelligent captain in the East India Company's service, has addressed a letter to the Medico Botanical Society of London, which contains the following, and is certainly worthy the most marked attention. He observes, "another fact is, that although on each one of the eight voyages I made to China, many of my crew had fallen a prey to cholera; yet I have never heard of a Chinese being attacked with this fatal epidemic. And this is the more remarkable from the crowded population of the country, subsisting, as they often do, on very unwholesome diet. As, then, the Chinese with whom tea [black] is the universal diluent, have escaped disease, and that other nations, and more particularly the coffee drinking French, have suffered so much from, it may not be unworthy the attention of your society whether tea may not be regarded as the principal cause of this unhappy exemption."

During the prevalence of cholera in Paris, in the years 1749, a cup of pure hot tea, with a small part of brandy, without cream or sugar, was a recipe much used, and which proved almost invariably successful in the premonitory symptoms, and even after the malignant type had commenced.—Detroit Tribune.

What are Cholera Symptoms?—The first symptoms is a mere rumbling in the bowels, sometimes so slightly as hardly to be perceptible. If a man is temperate and regular in his habits, it may pass off harmlessly, but a very little imprudence will bring on the next stage—diarrhœa—a simple diarrhœa, free from pain and not necessarily attended with rice-water evacuations. While the rumbling sensation exists, there is frequently a coldness at the pit of the stomach—and a feeling of what an Irishman described as a feeling of goneness, or emptiness. Rice water discharges take place sooner or later, next vomiting or purging, and generally cramps. The pulse becomes small, thread-like and almost imperceptible, the body assuming a purple cast, with a cold, clammy perspiration, the features pinched and contracted, the eyes sunken, and the hands shrivelled, called washerwoman's hands. This is the collapse state of the disease, from which the patient seldom recovers.

The greatest point in treatment of the disease is to arrest the diarrhœa. The rice water evacuations are, in fact, the serum of the blood, and when long continued, very little of the substance of the blood remains in the system, but the clot or solid portion of the blood. While, therefore, the diarrhœa is suffered to go on, the patient is going rapidly to the grave by the exhaustion of his very life-blood. During this stage, however, the disease is easily manageable.

The Bright side of Cholera.—Cholera has a bright side, for it has taught us to purify the water which we drink; to ventilate the rooms in which we live; to erect the dwellings of our labouring population with some regard to sanitary laws; to build them well and drain them effectually; to see that they are not overcrowded with human beings, and that they do not become unhealthy for want of space in which to conduct necessary domestic operations. Science may lament the weakness of curative medicine; but she rejoices in the knowledge that preventive measures do exist, and the investigation of the cholera, from having been unattended with satisfactory results, has led to the knowledge of many things before mysterious or unknown.—Household Medicine.

Strange Occurrence.—We understand that a man died in West Troy last Thursday evening, with a disease strongly resembling cholera, and his body was deposited in a coffin, and fully prepared for burial. The remains were kept until Saturday evening, and then, while the friends of the deceased were engaged in holding a wake over him, the supposed dead man slowly recovered from the state in which he had so long lain, and actually arose from the coffin, walked across the floor, and requested a drink of water, saying that he was very thirsty! This comes to us from one of the parties present, and we see no reason to doubt her statement. We further understand that the man is convalescent, and will recover.—Troy Times.

News from Venezeuela.

News from Porto Cabello, Venezeuela, to the 28th ult., reached New York on the 10th inst. by the schooner St. Mary, Capt. Johnson.

The revolution against the Monegas Government appears to be spreading. The province of El Guarico, bordering upon the province of Carracas, the seat of Government had revolted. The insurgent chief Barquisimeto, with some 3000 men, had reached San Carlos, in the province of Carabobo, to attack General Silva, who was at Tinaco in the same province. Silva had sent for more men. Col. Garoas, insurgent, with about 500 men, who was on his march to join Barquesimeto, had been overcome by Gen. Falcon, and, it was said, he and his whole party butchered.

Mr. Dall on the First of August.

Rev. Mr. Dall, of Canada West, was next introduced to the audience, and gave a very interesting account of the fugitives in that country, and of the feelings of the white people about them—mainly in answer to questions from persons in the audience, on the several points. He said that the fugitives generally found ready employment, the males as mechanics or laborers on farms, and the females in families. On one occasion, about a year ago, he asked S. R. Ward, the Agent of the Anti Slavery Society there, if any fugitives had recently arrived, and he replied that nineteen came the day before, and that he had obtained employment for all but two. That was the principal work of the Society. They employed Mr. Ward as their Agent, furnished his travelling expenses, and paid him a stated salary, to enable him to devote his whole time to the furtherance of the objects of the Society. The board of the fugitives was paid for a week or ten days, and it was seldom necessary to pay it for a longer time. The general fact was, that the fugitives were at work and able to take care of themselves. In fact, some of them had taken measures to stop the sending of money and clothing there from the benevolent in the States, by circulating widely an article in the newspapers, headed, 'No more aid for Fugitives.' Mr. Ward was soon expected home from England, with some four or five thousand dollars collected there, which would meet the wants and extend the efforts of the Society.

There was some indifference and hardness of heart observable among those colored people who were not fugitives; but who had been there fifteen or twenty years, and might be called old settlers. They were not prompt to meet the fugitives; while the fugitives themselves were always generous.—When Patrick Snead, as he was called, was arrested, the fugitives held public meetings and gave liberally for the purpose of rescuing him, some putting down a pound note to engage the services of a lawyer, that he might be protected and rescued upon the ground of the Ashburton Treaty, as it was said he was taken on British waters.

There was some difference among them in religious matters; but, generally, they had confidence in each other's honesty. He had seen colored men doing the best carpenter work in Toronto, where nice finishing, cornice work, &c., was needed.

What the colored people there needed, was an organizing mind to direct their efforts to the most profitable purpose. As an instance of the lack of Yankee calculation, Mr. D. stated that, one day, being in Montreal, he started to find Shadrach, 'of glorious memory,' and after going through several narrow streets, and examining all the signs, but finding no 'Shadrach,' he finally went into a small shop over which was a little sign with 'S. Makins, Victualler,' &c., upon it, and asked a man he saw there if he knew where Shadrach, who once lived in Boston, could be found. 'I am Shadrach,' replied the man. The man had a fortune in his name and did not know it—else he would surely have signed himself 'Shadrach.'

In reference to the effect of the climate upon the fugitives, Mr. Dall said he inquired of Shadrach who is further north than most of the fugitives, as to that matter, and he told him that he and his friends there realized no bad effects from that cause; they could not see that the climate had the least deleterious effect upon their constitutions, their power to work, or their general health.

He was sorry to see that there was quite as much pro-slavery feeling in Canada as in the United States. Western Canada was filled up chiefly with emigrants from England, Scotland, and Ireland, who expected, though in very subordinate positions, at home, to be 'lairds' of the soil, when they came to America, and they did not like to have the fugitives come into competition with them. He feared that, unless anti-slavery lecturers were busy there, to keep alive the fashionable tone of anti-slavery feeling, severe restrictive acts would be passed, placing a barrier at the line between the two countries, which the fugitives could not pass.

In regard to the question of annexation, the speaker said the thing had not been talked of since the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law. That act was looked upon as an inseparable barrier to the annexation of the two countries. The general feeling now was in favour of the union of all the colonies, as independent States under the title of 'The United States of British North America.' Of course the colored people deprecated the idea of annexation to the United States.

An important question among the colored men was, whether it was most expedient for them to settle themselves abroad among the whites, or form exclusive settlements of their own, somewhat on the plan of the Elgin Association. Much, Mr. D. remarked, was to be said on both sides, and he hoped that some of the leading anti-slavery papers here would give them light as to the expediency of isolating themselves, or becoming, as the best part of the English population hoped they would become, 'a good peasantry' among the whites.

Referring to the Elgin Association in charge of the Rev. William King, (an emancipator of his own slaves, and for a time a Presbyterian preacher in Ohio,) Mr. Dall spoke of their school. He said it was intended at first only for colored children. It was so well taught, however, that the white farmers around petitioned for the privilege of sending their children! At this time, it is said that more than half the pupils are white, and that the 'black' school is becoming the 'fashionable' academy of that region.

C. L. Remond then came forward, and made the concluding speech. He said that as that was a free platform in regard to speech, he hoped that it would be made also a free platform in regard to color; that it would not be long before some colored man, other than himself, would come forward and make his mark on that platform, especially on the First of August.

Mr. R. said, in reference to the remarks of the preceding speaker, that he was not in favour of the fugitive slaves going to Canada even, because he wanted it kept constantly and plainly before the world, that they had a right to stay in this land. If they must flee, let them flee from one State to another, until they should stir up humanity enough to defend them on their own soil. [Cheers.] Another reason was, that he believed the day was not far distant when that country would become so identified with the United States, that the colored man's rights would be no more respected there than here, and then they would occupy less advantageous ground than if they had remained here. No longer than last summer, he went to Toronto, and found prejudice as rife there as here. He went to three or four public houses, before he found one at which he could be admitted. There were colored churches, ministers and schools, and it seemed to him that the colored people were themselves carrying that damnable prejudice to Canada, if it were not there before.

He protested, before God and his fellowmen, against the colored man's flying to Canada. Let them stay here and fight the battle out. The day was coming when the fugitive slave might remain here in safety, and that day was hastened just so far as his friends would sustain the society that had gathered them together. The anti-slavery movement would yet make the atmosphere so warm with righteous sentiment that no disgraceful Curtis, nor shabby Loring, nor contemptible Freeman could be found in our midst, but every one of them should be more despised and disgraced than was the colored man now. His heart had been greatly gladdened at seeing so many colored people on the ground. They had acted for some time as if they were discouraged, and had not shown their faces. They should come forward anywhere and everywhere that freemen come, and especially on such occasions as that.

If they would only continue faithful, they would redeem Massachusetts, and Massachusetts would magnetize her neighbours, and and all New England and all the North would become free.

He was glad to hear Mr. Higginson's remarks in reference to his change of feeling in regard to the efficiency of any political organization in the anti-slavery movement. It was of no use to mince matters. He had stood by the Free-Soil party when he thought the party needed a friend to stand by it; but the only organization which could do anything effectually for the slave, was that organization which knew no sect, no color, and no clime—and on the platform of such an organization, he then stood. He would tell his white friends that when they, like William Lloyd Garrison, should come to be considered in England, Ireland, and Scotland as black men and women, because of their zeal for the slave, the question would be settled. [Cheers.]—Liberator.

The Slave Pirate Case.

A final hearing took place yesterday, before United States Commissioner Ingraham, in the case of Captain Donald, of the Grey Eagle, charged with having landed six hundred slaves on the Island of Cuba. The preliminary hearing in this case was had on Saturday last, at which time we published the testimony then elicited. Yesterday there were three witnesses examined, one Frenchmen and two Portuguese, whose testimony corroborated that of the lad, already given, which, in substance, was that they were shipped in New York in March last, to go to St. Thomas and other ports. The shipping articles were produced, which contained the names of the sailors and the destination of the vessel. After they had been out about 25 days, the crew were informed by the defendant that they were going to the Coast of Africa for a load of negroes. The crew, up to that time, were not aware of the destination of the vessel, and did not then object, because there was no other remedy. They landed first at Cape Palmas, and proceeded thence to Cajuda, about four days' sail, and there took in the load of slaves, 600 and odd in number; there were about 250 women, and 50 children; the Spanish captain seemed to have the principal command after the slaves were taken on board, but the vessel was jointly navigated by both captains; on arriving at the Island of Cuba the vessel was run into a creek, and the slaves were landed under the protection of the police, the crew being afraid of the soldiers; the head policeman, a governor, was bribed for this purpose; $32,000 having been paid him, according to the testimony of these witnesses. The slaves were taken in the night to the plantation of Don Louis, which occupied about six hours travel over a bad road. The next night the crew also went to the plantation of Don Louis, where they remained for several days in a sugar loft, until a small schooner was procured to take the crew to Havana. They were paid at Don Louis' plantation $450 each, in addition to their wages. On arriving at Havana they were told that each person must look out for himself, and arrive in the United States on board of different vessels. The boy, Town, made a statement to the American Consul at Havana, and was sent to the United States in custody. The defendant was finally committed for trial at the next term of the Circuit Court, and the witnesses also, to testify, in default of bail. Guillou for the defendant.—Philadelphia Daily Register.

Another Slave Murdered.

A horrible murder was committed in Hendersonville, Kentucky, on Saturday, the 8th of July, 1854, by a Rev. Mr. Joel Lambert, upon the person of one of his slaves, a man about 45 years old. He was seen to knock down the slave three times with a loaded whip, some six feet in length, and give him more than a hundred lashes with the same. He was abused in a field and died, and was shrouded in the same field. In a few hours the coroner, Mr. James Rouse, held an inquest over the mangled body, and the verdict was that the slave came to his death by over-heating and imprudent whipping. The Grand Jury will take the case in hand and deal with him according to law, if there yet remains any law for aggravated cases of murder in Kentucky. It was more brutal than the Mat. Ward tragedy.

P. S.—I wish you would request other papers favorable to freedom and humanity to publish this.

The preacher that committed this foul deed belonged to the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, and was, as I understand, their regular Pastor. This is a fair specimen of the foul principle of slavery.

By an Extra of the Canada Gazette, we learn that Parliament will meet for despatch of business on Tuesday, the 5th of September next. The time for receiving Petitions for Private or Local bills will expire on the 20th September.

For some time back a fierce fire has been raging in the woods above Lachine, L. C., and having extended to the settlements, we regret to say that it has been attended by a loss of life. The New Currency.

All former currency acts are repealed, and it is enacted that the denomination of money in the currency of this Province shall be called be pounds, dollars, shilling, pence, cents, and mills; the pound, shilling, and penny shall have the same proportionate value respectively, as they now have. In any agreement or statement as to money, either denomination may be lawfully used. The pound currency is to be of 101-321-1000 grains troy, of gold, the dollar to be one-fourth of the pound. The pound sterling to be £1 4s. 3d., or $4 85⅔ cents currency, and to be a legal tender for that amount. Less British coin to be also a legal tender for proportionate rates.

No silver coins shall be a legal tender for more than £2 10s. currency.

Wheat Crop of Canada.

We learn from a gentleman who has traversed Canada, from London to Montreal, and visited much of the interior, that the wheat crop of Upper Canada will far exceed that of any other year in its amount.

It is estimated a third more was sown last year than before, and it all looks flourishing. The surplus estimated last year 7,000,000 bush. This year it is calculated the surplus will reach 12,000,000 bushels. Estimating the price at only $1.50 per bushel, it gives the farmers $10,000,000 for wheat, alone, for foreign market.

The Canadian farmers last year enjoyed great prosperity, and this season bids fair to add largely to the contents of their coffers. The united circulation of the Banks is over $22,000,000. Of this sum, it is estimated full $15,000,000 is now in the hands of the farmers.

The notes of the banks do not return upon them sufficiently for ordinary transactions of the day, and hence there is a great scarcity of currency for daily business. Every bank in the Province has made application for an increase of capital, to the amount of $15,000,000. The Cannucks are rapidly becoming a "go-ahead" people.

Thousands of laborers are wanted to secure the grain harvest. The railroads now employ all the laborers offering, at high wages. Harvest labor is up to $1.37½ per day.—Rochester American.

The Tide of Emigration.—During the month of June last, fifty-one emigrant ships took their departure from Liverpool, having on board 21,767 passengers. Of these, thirty-two ships were bound for the United States, having on board 13,866 passengers, composed of 2,124 English, 318 Scotch, and 9,042 Irish, and the remainder, 2,381 natives of other countries, chiefly Germans; six ships for Canada, with 3,238 emigrants; one for New Brunswick, with 255 passengers on board; and twelve for the Australian colonies, of an aggregate tonnage of 14,922 tons, and with 3,734 adult passengers on board, of whom 2,007 were English, 1,699 Scotch, 562 Irish, and the remainder, 466, natives of other countries. The total emigration from Liverpool for all foreign ports during the quarter ending June 30 was 83,230, as compared with 74,641 in the corresponding quarter ending June 30 was 84,230, as compared with 74,641 in the corresponding quarter of last year, showing an increase in the number of emigrants of 9,589. This is the largest number of emigrants who have sailed from that port during any quarter.

Arrest of Counterfeiters.

We understand that in consequence of information received by Government, that an extensive and well-organised band of counterfeiters in the border townships were engaged in the manufacture of spurious hard and paper money, the Attorney-General instructed Mr. Felton, the Crown Officer at Sherbrooke, to superintend the necessary proceedings for their extirpation in the townships, as well as in the district of Montreal as in that of St. Francis. Under this authority, Mr. Clark, the well known High Constable of Sherbrooke, arranged a plan of operations, and carried out the details, and has succeeded within the last few months in quietly arresting many of these gentry, with their tools of trade, including coining plates and forged bills. The stronghold of the gang, however, was ascertained to be in Dunham, and the most effectual measures were undertaken to attack them. Every thing being arranged, and every precaution having been adopted to avoid failure, a large force of constables under the command of Messrs. Johnson and Clark, were assembled on the spot from different points, and on Tuesday evening last a descent was made upon the unsuspecting counterfeiters. Many suspected persons were arrested, and a large booty was secured. After some search and examination, six leaders in the nefarious traffic were finally detained, making, with those previously arrested, twelve noted snaggers, of whom the country will now be rid, if the courts do their duty, for it must be remarked that the plan of operations contemplated arresting no one until full proof sufficient for conviction had first been obtained. The result of the operations is that about forty plates, two printing presses for printing counterfeit bills, a large number of dies, moulds, and other tools for making hard money, together with an immense "boodle," have been taken. Such a severe blow has never before been struck in this Province against this villainous traffic, and we confidently trust that by a little further exertion it will be completely rooted out. It is, we believe, only justice to say, that it is to the able management, skill and caution of Mr. Clark, that this success is mainly to be attributed, and it cannot be forgotten what good service that efficient officer rendered the public some years since by a similar operation.—Montreal Pilot.

Speeches of Mr. Dall of Canada, and Mr. Remond of the United States, on the 1st of August, at Abington, Masachusetts.

We often feel impelled by a sense of duty to our readers to lay before them the course now being pursued by many of our own people and also many of our professed friends, who have heretofore gloried in the name of abolitionists, that they may see for themselves, and take their measures accordingly; being certain, from accumulated evidence, that it is calculated to work out for us evil only, and that continually; and fearing, too, from facts equally certain, that there is deep laid design on the part of some of those "friends," so working, to oblige us to effect our own destruction; but we are as often deterred by the fear expressed by many of our people, that we will "stir up our friends against us." We are told that they are powerful—that we should be very cautious—that even colonizationists should not be opposed in their schemes by us, as, "may be, it is an honest difference of opinion?"—That as we have one set of interests with the colored people of the States, we should listen to their advisers, in order to get on smoothly—in short, should be guided, led, directed by them—should have them do our thinking, though, by the way, we should do the acting, and, finally, should settle down in that snail-like and quiet obliviousness so desirable to persons who are conscious of their duty and ineffable privilege—the only one we should have—of waiting until they say our feet are strong enough to stand upon, that they may shower upon us the manna in their keeping for us; but really we have not been able to resist introducing the speeches there spoken of, to further notice a friend of "union," as we are, even at the risk of displeasing the very still people dotted on our social map, as are the flies our sphere. We pass over Mr. Dall's statement relating to the terms made by the anti-Slavery Society with Mr. Ward—the funds spoken of, &c., and come at once to the general theme. To the charge of "indifference and hardness of heart" made against the "old colored settlers, who were not fugitives," and that nonsense about the pounds, we would say, that a more wilfully wicked stab is seldom attempted, even by our professed enemies. What do anti-Slavery men hope to gain, in the end, by this worse than satanic attempt to imbitter one class of colored people in Canada towards another? and who do they intend to convince, by flattering fugitives, and giving the impression that the misfortune of having been born a slave, confers superior right to general consideration, over a man that had been born free? If there were not a deep-laid scheme to work evil to our people in this country, and to the colored people of the United States, by promulgating such views, whether "in answer to questions" or otherwise, in public places, and before thousands of those known to favor white emigration from the States to this country, at the same time that they counsel the colored man to "stand still," tell us would such statements, and others in the speech of Mr. Dall, be made? Why attempt to divide the free-born man, from, and array his fugitive brother against him, but that the designs against the fugitive might be frustrated, could he counsel and advise with his neighbor?" We hope colored men in Canada will look this matter full in the face. An enemy comes boldly before you, and you and he can have a trial of strength; but "our friends," if we are to judge by their mouth-pieces, act the part of the wolf in the clothing of the sheep. Mr. Dall has in a few instances, when speaking of what is patent to every observer, adhered to the facts; but it is strange that in every instance involving an opinion, though well supported in by the experience of colored Canadians, he has seen fit to report adversely to our interests, and to the feelings and opinions of our people. In the Patrick Snead case, we have learned from the best authority, that, though contributions were showered liberally by men, without regard to birth, as free-born or fugitives, the only pound given by any one individual, was given by a man actually born free—of twenty years' residence in the Province—a person respected by fugitives and all.

But, says Mr. Dall, "colored men need an organizing mind to direct their purpose," although he has been pleased to admit that some of the best carpenters' work, &c., they do. This profound opinion is based upon the fact, that, unlike many Yankee exemplars and gamblers generally, they are not disposed to coin money by using a fictitious basis, as a name, for instance;—not anxious to make the most by offering, at best, a doubtful equivalent for the sum to be obtained—say giving security for hard cash in some hair-breadth escape—a name used at the time, —a narrative of sufferings when in slavery, or something of the sort, when the whole proceeding was an act of simple duty even to the using of the name, and when a great field lies before him, in which fact, not fancy, makes it imperative that every man who would reap should sow—not become a pensioner on the bounty of every man because he had not opportunities at one time, now that they invite him to find his own bread. "He was sorry to see that there was quite as much pro-Slavery feeling in Canada as in the United States * * * and anti-Slavery lecturers should be busy here to keep alive the fashionable tone of anti-Slavery feeling, lest severe restrictive acts would be passed," &c. We remember to have heard this same Mr. Dall, at the meeting against the Provincial Council, held here last winter, draw the attention of the colored people of Toronto to the surprising difference between Canada and the States in this matter of prejudice, instancing, at the time, the patronage extended to colored men in business; the equal privileges enjoyed by colored students in our colleges, and many other facts. The free introduction of anti-Slavery lecturers among the wild English, Scotch and Irish, will effect but little good to any community, should they be needed to the extent Mr. Dall declares, if they are of the "fashionable" sort. That kind never did good any where, and especially in Canada. We trace to Mr. Dall's fashionables much of the disagreement among colored people here. If we cannot be privileged to listen to genuine anti-Slavery men, we do not want to hear any; it would be better to do as the people are trying to do when not interfered with—make, by their industry and their own opposition to oppression, a strong anti-Slavery feeling. We venture the opinion, that there are men in Canada in sufficient numbers, and of wisdom enough to make all the anti-Slavery needed here, and we believe that these Provinces will yet do more to destroy Yankee slavery, than the United States themselves. Were the white people of the West inclined to pass restrictive acts, the West could not do so without concurrence of other portions of the Province;—they could not do as an individual State of the U. S. is often known to do, in violation of all constitutional and other obligations. But this panic maker to the colored people of the States, admits that the fugitive slave law prevented annexation. How is that? The law is executed in the States, however much professional talkers may declare to the contrary, but Canada refuses an alliance with the States because of its adoption; and yet there is as much hatred of colored people as in the States, says Mr. Dall. The people who, outside of all organizations, receive the victim of that law, are represented as comparing with the men who seize them under the law. We are to have the "United States of British North America." Indeed!

With such important disclosures on the part of Mr. Dall, we are prepared, somewhat, for his main and most dangerous assertions, and also for the speech of Mr. Remond, in which he protests "before God" against the colored man's going to Canada, that they may, among other things, if misfortune should come upon them, have the opportunity of fleeing ("fleaing"), indeed, from State to State. Colored Canadians are reported to be in doubt as to whether they should settle abroad among the whites, and by inference of Mr. Dall and the "best part of the English population," a few pre-minent anti-Slavery men and women, so-called, of Canada, and their advisers of the United States, become a good peasantry among the whites he has spoken of, as having been "in subordinate position at home," or, isolate themselves as at "Elgin." Just here a number of questions crowd themselves upon us. When did colored people give Mr. Dall assurances of their perplexity of mind on these points? Who are they? and what does he hope towards quieting their troubled spirits from "the leading anti-Slavery papers of the States," seeing they do not circulate among them to any extent? Does the gentleman want a newspaper agency?—and last, but not least, is there a combination of efforts to reflect upon the Elgin Association, by ringing the changes upon its asserted exclusiveness? Colored men will laugh at the "stew" into which Mr. Dall and his friends seem to be, about them, and will no doubt incline to forgive their bad manners, as shown by taking their business upon themselves in true colonization fashion, without saying "by your leave," but they will not so readily forgive them for the mischievous tendency of their movements to stir up one class against another—to deter colored people from participating in the advantages of a residence here; for trying to make a doubtful sort of work, for their own "personal, family," or other "considerations," where nothing is desired of them; or by trying to reflect unjustly upon the only association of the many established here, that is really worth favorable mention. There is evidently a want of harmony or "union" as to the Elgin, as on other points. The views of Mr. Dall's "best part" run in contravention to it, although the Elgin does not present any feature opposed to indiscriminate settlement amongst the whites. Now, friends, for a full measure of your wrath for this review of our "friend" Mr. Dall and his friends. We have only to say your blows against the Freeman for such impertinence, should you so decide it to be, must be well directed. *

The First of August at Chatham and Dawn.

From the papers published in the States, and from papers, correspondence, &c., here, we are led to believe that the celebration of the 1st of August, was conducted on a more extensive scale than at any period for several years. Our city papers gave pretty full intelligence of the movements here, on that day, but, beyond the bare fact of festivities, &c., in other places in the Province, we have not, until at present, been able to obtain information that we could venture to place before our readers.

At Chatham, a large concourse of citizens repaired to a grove, to partake of a dinner, &c. At Dawn, 18 miles from Chatham, there seems to have been quite a large celebration, and one highly creditable to the people in the details of the arrangements, but, as accounts vary as to the general feeling respecting subjects brought before them, foreign to the purposes of the day, we here give an extract from Mr. Frederick Douglass' Paper on the point, and also the account of another eye-witness, one of our correspondents, that our readers may decide for themselves. Speaking of Dawn, the writer referred to, says:—

"But in Dawn a procession was formed at the School House, at half-past 12 o'clock, which marched to Green Lawn, when the ceremonies of the day were opened by appointing Rev. Mr. Henson Chairman, who, on taking the chair, made a few appropriate remarks, and concluded by introducing Mr. Frederick Douglass. And to leave the subject, allow me to say, that of the very many receptions that I have witnessed, as given to that man, he never received such a cold one as then and there; the people left it for his friend, Scoble and Henson alone to receive, cheer, and do everything necessary on such an occasion, and prepared themselves to criticise his opinions as given them, and his sentiments as expressed heretofore respecting Emigration, Canada, &c.—But he allowed nothing to drop from his lips that they could take hold of. He expressed himself opposed to emigration to Canada, only as a mass,—believing, it would be injurious to the present inhabitants of Canada, and their interests; and, secondly, that the people of the States wanted us to emigrate, that Slavery might be extended over the entire Union. After speaking nearly two hours without the least approbation, except from the above named persons, he sat down, and Mr. Scoble arose, and spoke upon the British West India Emancipation—the means by which it was effected—those engaged in it—the active part, he, as an individual, had taken in bringing it about, and a string of things too numerous to mention, seeming thereby to be recommending himself for the praise of the people, which I assure you was not given. After dinner, the Rev. Mr. King addressed the meeting, taking opposite grounds to the former speakers, especially Douglass, which met the approbation of the people, and when I left at six o'clock, Douglass had arisen a second time to defend his position, but the people of Dawn showed themselves to be entirely opposed to him. He remained there two days, for want of conveyance to Chatham; meetings being appointed three nights in succession, before he arrived to address them. And when he did, on the 4th inst., he charged the coloured people with being negligent, and not so desirous of hearing him as the whites, which made some of us wish for some other public speaker who had been acquainted with him and his history for the past few years. Mr Scoble gave them no satisfaction at Dawn, respecting their land, school, &c., on the 1st., although it was expected on that day."

The following extract, is Mr. Frederick Douglass' account of the proceeding: *

The whole celebration was conducted with order and decorum, and reflected credit upon the people of Dawn. It was open to criticism in some respects; but, not more so than other similar demonstrations by the white race. The afternoon exercises were slightly marred by Mr. J. C. Brown, who seized the opportunity that the occasion afforded, to offer some objections to the plans and purposes entertained by Messrs. Scoble, Henson, and others, as to the future management of the affairs of Dawn. The complaints brought by Mr. Brown were two-fold. The first was, that the Dawn property, (if Mr. Scoble's views were carried out,) would no longer be enjoyed by fugitives from Slavery, but would be monopolized by English, Scotch and Irish, Mr. Scoble being in favour of receiving white, as well as black pupils into the school; the second objection was, that the proceedings of Messrs. Scoble and Henson, were unauthorized and illegal. Mr. Brown was replied to by Mr. Henson; and, to those acquainted with the facts of the case, his reply was every way satisfactory.—The audience, at least, evinced much pleasure, when they found, after all that Mr. Brown had said to the contrary, the declaration of trust, setting forth the objects of Dawn, was strictly in harmony with the declared purposes of Messrs. Scoble, Henson, Carey, and others, to whose wisdom and co-operation, the place must owe its future usefulness. To the second count alleged against them by Mr. Brown, they replied with equal success; and most of the company appeared to regard the controversy as terminating most favourably to the interests of Dawn. But here we must drop this narrative; our columns are full for the present; the subject will be continued.

For the "Provincial Freeman."

Meeting to Organize the Provincial Union.

According to previous notice, a large number of the citizens of Toronto met in the Sayer Street Chapel, for the purpose of forming a Provincial Union Association, Rev. Wm. P. Newman was called to the Chair, and J. B. Lewis was appointed Secretary.

Rev. Samuel Lewis opened the meeting with prayer; after which, the object of the meeting having been stated, on motion of Mr. Thos. Smallwood, seconded by Mr. S. Lewis, the meeting voted to organize a Provincial Union.

Miss M. A. Shadd was then called upon to read the Constitution, Pledge, &c., which, after a harmonious discussion, were unanimously adopted.

The Officers, whose names are appended to the Constitution, were then appointed for the year, by an unanimous vote.

Voted—That the male members of the Union shall meet for business once in every fortnight, and that the females meet weekly; the time to be decided upon by the Committees respectively.

Remarks were made by Messrs. Lewis, Smallwood, Baker, Judah, Thompson, Phillips, and others; after which, names were enrolled, and the meeting adjourned, after a protracted but pleasant and animated session, in good order.

Voted—That M. A. Shadd be specially appointed to organize auxiliaries.

WM. P. NEWMAN,
Chairman.

Secretary.

Toronto, C.W., Aug. 9, 1854.

Constitution of the Provincial Union.

ARTICLE I.

We, the undersigned, associate for the purpose of carrying out the following Pledge :—

BELIEVING in the necessity of measures to further promote literature, general intelligence, active benevolence, the principles of universal freedom, and a British union not based on complexional considerations, and in the imperative duty now resting upon us to thwart the plans now maturing to array one class of Her Majesty's subjects against another, and increasing class, on the grounds of the complexional characteristics and origin of the latter, we pledge ourselves to do all in our power in our associated capacity, as Members of this Union, and in our private capacity, as citizens,—1st: To promote a healthy harmony, and to diffuse a loyal spirit among those of Her Majesty's subjects with whom we may associate, or come in contact. 2nd. To encourage and support a Press, or those Presses, in Canada, which will stand on the watch-tower to notify the citizens of this country against the unjust imputations, reflections and designs of many in the United States and this country, who would carve out a policy for emigrants, formerly bond, and free, different from white emigrants who may and do settle herein, by counselling the former to be a "good peasantry" for the latter as their highest ambition; or to aggregate themselves into exclusive communities, or to look upon the West Indies as the home for the mass, in preference to the free soil of Canada; thereby promulgating the dangerous doctrine that God's children, of different complexions, cannot live together under the protection of the British Lion, in British America, unless those of darker hue, become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to those of white complexion. 3rd. To do all in our power to remove the stain of Slavery from the face of the earth, and particularly, as subjects of Great Britain, to check its progress in America by all legitimate means; and, 5th. To encourage the rising generation in literary, scientific, and mechanical efforts. 6th. As a nucleus of operations, to support the "Provincial Freeman," as our organ, so long as it may be found to advocate sound principles, and to use our ability to promote objects in connexion with it, to further honest endeavours in this direction.

ARTICLE II.

For the better success of the above measures, the Parent Society shall consist of a President, a Vice-President, Recording and Corresponding Secretaries, Treasurer, and a Committee as extensive as the number of signatures to the Pledge.

ARTICLE III.

The annual fee of each male member shall be 2s. 6d. c'y.

ARTICLE. IV.

The Female Members shall organize a Committee, with a Moderator, Secretary and Treasurer; and the annual contribution for each member, shall be 1s. 3d.

ARTICLE V.

The object of the Ladies' Committee shall be to prepare articles for an Annual Fair, to be held in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Chatham and other large cities and towns, at which auxiliaries may be formed; also, to devise other measures for promoting the specific object; namely, the support of the people's organ, the Provincial Freeman.

ARTICLE VI.

Auxiliary Societies may be formed in each town, city, or village, in which parties may be found to take as their basis the Constitution of this Society, provided that they, at their option, make such local arrangements as the peculiarities of the case require.

ARTICLE VII.

The officers of this Society shall be elected annually, and at each annual meeting, one or more persons shall be empowered to assist in forming auxiliaries, and in whatever way the interests of the Society may demand.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Ladies' Committee shall meet every Monday evening, for the purpose of making up articles, useful and elegant; and to them shall be entrusted the details of their plans.

ARTICLE IX.

A monthly meeting of members, both male and female, shall be assembled for the purpose of promoting the literary objects specified by recitations of original pieces, reading, debates, &c. Twice in the year at the semi-annual and annual meetings parties shall be solicited to address the Society.

ARTICLE X.

This Constitution can be altered at the Annual Meeting, by a vote of a majority of members present, and the addition of the votes from each auxiliary society, through delegates from the same, provided, that at whatever place the Annual Fair may be held, the Annual Meeting shall be held for the time being.

FOUR DAYS LATER.

Breadstuffs advanced.—Russians Retiring from Bucharest.—Reported Capture of Aland.—Espartero's Advice accepted by Queen Isabella.

AUGUST 16, 1854.

The Union from Havre, 2nd inst., arrived at 9½ this morning,

Flour speculators demand 1s. 6d., advance. Corn advanced 2s. 6d. and 3s. Money easy

The Russians are retreating from Bucharest.

Espartero has arrived in Madrid and the Queen has accepted the programme drawn up by him.

ADDITIONAL.

It is rumoured that the Island of Aland has been captured by the Allies, with great loss of life. No particulars are given.

Nothing new from the Black Sea.

The Russians are falling back upon the Pruth for strategetic reasons. An advance upon the Crimea, had been agreed upon.

The Baltic had arrived out on the second.

A rumour was current of the defeat of the Russians at Slobodzic on the 22nd July, with a loss of 200 men and 500 prisoners.

A grand council of war was held at Varna on the 19th, at which Omar Pasha and the allied generals were present.

The combined fleets remained at Baltschik.

A slight republican manifestation had occurred at Paris. Several arrests were made.

Numerous Austrian reinforcements had arrived at Parma.

The Danish Government had proclaimed the Constitution for the entire monarchy.

FURTHER FROM SPAIN.

Espartero was received at Madrid with great enthusiasm, and at last accounts all was quiet.

The Queen of Spain has restored Generals O'Donnell, Serrano and Dulce to their rank. The palace was guarded by troops. The national guard is composed of 9 battalions and 2 batteries of artillery. A decree of the Junta suppresses the royal council, and another calls in force the press law of 1837. The Junta has also abrogated the prohibition law laid on the circulation of certain foreign journals. Several of the ex-ministers, also General Quinto, have been ordered to be arrested and tried. It is said that the former are concealed in the hotels of the diplomatic body. The Queen Christina has not left Madrid. General O'Donnell was at Cordova on the 25th, en route for Madrid.

Ohio flour is quoted 33s. 6d.; yellow corn 34s.; mixed 32s.—white 34s. 6d. Wheat rather firmer, and ranging from 8s. 9d. to 9s. 3d. Lard advanced 1s. Provisions generally active. Trade at Manchester steady.

Arrival of the "America."

The steamer America arrived on Wednesday evening, the 16th inst., at 5 o'clock.

The Canadian Legislative Council Bill passed its second reading in the House of Commons, on the 4th inst.

On the moring of the 30th ult., the Russians are said to have attacked the Turkish and French camps at Giurgevo, but were totally defeated with a loss of 2,000 killed and a large number of prisoners. The Russians were retreating in forced marches. They had quitted Frateschti, and it was occupied by the Turks.

The evacuation of Wallachia was completed, and a proclamation had been issued, declaring that all soldiers who remained behind would be considered deserters. The Russian troops were concentrated on the Sereth.

The Ausrtian army under Prince Lichtenste n is ordered to advance from Pesth to Gallatoa. The army in Gallatoa is moving towards the frontier. The Arch-Duke Albrecht has removed his head-quarters to Kromstadt, in the south-east corner of Transylvania.

The total Austrian force on the frontier reached 300,000 men, under the command of Baron Deckers.

The frontier had not been crossed, but preparations for hostilities were on a colossal scale.

Russia makes no warlike demonstration towards the Prussian frontier.

The cholera was increasing in violence at Constantinople. The third French division left Varna on the 28th for Kurtangee.

The accounts from Montenegro were unsatisfactory. Prince Danielos had assumed a threatening attitude towards the Turks at Aputez.

The Black Sea.

The allied fleets with Generals Canrobert and Brown, had proceeded towards the Crimea coast to reconnoitre.

The Times declares positively that a force of from 80,000 to 100,000 men, British, French, and Turks, will invade the Crimea, and will attempt to effect a lodgment on the heights that command Sebastopol.

From Asia the reported defeat of the Turks by the Russians is confirmed, and the Russians were beseiging Kars.

Cholera had made its appearance among the British troops.

Since the 23rd the blockade of the ports on the Gulf of Finland has been most rigorous, it not being possible for any vessels to enter or leave.

The Russian Arch Duke Constantine and the Arch Duchess had a narrow escape from being captured by an English steamer near Cronstadt.

The Baltic.

The Baltic allied fleet are at Letz Sound.

At latest accounts, General Baraguay D'Hilliers had had an interview with the King of Sweden. His Majesty declared his willingness to unite with the Western Powers on certain conditions.

D'Hilliers with the French troops, had joined the fleet off Aland Island.

Four hundred British, on the 28th, made a descent on Colinga, on the island of Desch, and afterwards destroyed four boats, Spain.

Affairs generally tranquil. Espartero had taken the oaths as President of the new Council.

On the 2nd instant the barricades at Madrid were being removed at Espartero's desire.

The nomination of O'Donnell is the most popular of any in the new ministry.

SUBTERRANEAN TELEGRAPH.—Great efforts are now being made in England for the extension of telegraph lines under the waters of the Mediterranean. Recently a very large telegraph cable has been made to be sunk in the Mediterranean. It is 110 miles in length, and weighs somewhere about 800 tons. It contains six copper wires, or conductors for the fluid to traverse, protected by a gutta-percha covering secured in a hempen rope, and finally surrounded with twelve iron wires of No. 1 guage. The projector and originator, Mr. John Watkins Bret, profiting by experience, has allowed 20 miles for what is technically termed "slack" and "way," and for depths of the ocean. As now coiled in the yard, the cable occupies about 75 feet, taking its convex sides. The perpendicular height of the coil is about five feet, and the width of one side of the coil from convex to concave reaches 24 feet.—the moment it is laid, London will be in immediate communication with Cagliari, in Corsica, through the cable and about 400 mile of subterranean wire.

Land Sales.

A correspondent inquires concerning lands. In reply we give the following abstract of lands now for sale:

Mr. Edward Emery, of London. C. W., advertises an important sale of Town lots, to take place on the 19th day of June. Terms of payment, one-eighth down, or by notes at three or six months, if required; the balance in ten equal annual payments, with interest.

Poetry.

A Cat-egorical Courtship.

I sat me down, I scarcely can tell why,
To the window sill, and there I sat,
And I looked out, and I looked in,
Mid the pattering sound of the pelting rain,
Two lovers, whose love was as warm as mine,
Sat looking out and looking in.

Well, I said to myself, I never can Find the means to a declaration,
Top the post of a lover's ambition,
And be one of the favored fortunate men
To take her hand and stammered, coughed and stuttered,
But some how, nothing had been uttered.

I think the distance was too good to be lost
I left my chair up pretty close beside her,
Drew a long breath, and then my legs I crossed,
Buttoned my coat, and for five minutes eyed her.
She looked as if she knew what next was coming,
And with her foot was drumming.

I felt that I was to begin, or where,
I could not, I suppose, the words were always there;
I saw cool me, I stood tied to the chair,
Lazily reading, was awfully provoking,
The spirit of love in me pore was oozing,
My head, heart and hands their power seemed losing.

At length I saw a brindled tabby cat
Was coming up, inviting me to pat her;
And from me, electric-like at that,
My words, like summer clouds, began to scatter.

I seized on Tabby though a scratch she gave me,
And said, "Come Pussy ask Mary if she'll have me."

'Twas done at once, the murder now was out,
The thing was all explained in half a minute,
She blushed, and turning pussy cat about,
Said "Pussy, tell him yes," her foot was in it
The cat thus saved me all of my cat-egory,
And here's the catastrophe of my story.

Sad Result of an Early Courtship.

If you can't get them that you want, you must take them that you can get, and that is how I came to marry Patsey. Love will go where 'tis sent, anyhow, and you can't help it, and the harder a chap loves a gal, the poorer chance he haves of her; the thing is just here, the more he loves her, the more shy and trembling he is; and he can't tell half his feelin's to her if he tries, while the careless and unfeelin's chap, that's got no more love in him than a hoss, can have a half dozen gals after him at once. I have tho't that the heart was like a mudturtle's egg; you dent the shell on the one side—a dent on the other side in the same manner will bring it smooth again. So with the heart: one gal makes a dent, it remains bruised until some other gal presses it, pushing out the old bruise and leaving a new one.

Well, well, accidents will happen—folks will laugh—the world is more fond of fun than love—and they might as well laugh at me as anybody.

So I agreed to tell you about my first courtship. It wasn't Patsey, but my first sweetheart was a proper han'some gal. I walked for her father. Ohio was all in the woods then, and everybody lived in log houses, except down in Cleveland there was a house or two. And my three hundred acres, that is now worth one hundred and fifty dollars an acre, wasn't worth when I got it only three dollars. Pshaw! pshaw! how time has changed. Glad to get cornbread and gammon gravy then, had to go thirty miles down to Chagrin to mill. I always used to go for hoss instead of himself, for I only "neated" ninety pounds in weight, and made a lighter load over a load of corn, hoss back. Let me see, I weigh eighty now. Well, I was twenty-five years old just about, and in love with hoss's daughter. But I always thought she felt a little above me, for I was not taller than I am now, not quite as full as she was anyhow, and was working for eight dollars a month; had to dress in linen at that. You never seen one of them logging frocks, made like a shirt out of flax tow, did ye? Well, till I bought this new coat, when I married Patsey, thirty five years ago, I never wore any but tow, and if it wasn't Sunday to-day, I shouldn't had it on, for I despise 'stravagance and new-fangled flummeries and thingumbob noodles around our big houses.

I was in love 35 years ago, and never dared to say a word about it. Her name was Jerusha. I longed to tell her how my heart swelled and burst to be used through against the "critter," but I couldn't screw my courage up to the pint—but tho't I would some day, I'd been alone with her many a time, and had resolved on popping it right out, but the stillness was awful on them 'ccasions as the roar of Niagara, and my heart could feel all over like your little finger does when you hit your elbow gin a think accidental, a tarnal tinglin' follows.

Cuss my luck, said I to myself one day night, as I come home from the mill after a three days' ride. Jerusha had a beau, a chap from town, dressed as smart as a dancing master. My heart jumped into my gullet the moment I saw him. I felt it in the mouth, for knowed I was a goner. Had on broadcloth. Talk of your new-fangled gossip and gresbun houses now, but like in them days didn't have but one room of stairs, and a ladder to go up stairs by. Puncheon floors was good enough below, and clapboard stakes split out by hand, kivered the chamber floor. It was so in boss' house, and I kept up chamber. I want you to imagine two wooden hooks tied up to hang a gun on, right over the hearth on the chamber beam; I want you to remember my feelin's that night after I went to bed. Jerusha and the young chap had the hull room below to themselves, with a roasting fire to spark by. I couldn't stand the temptation to want to know what they had to say to themselves. Whisper, whisper, whisper. You may laugh at it, 'tis the naked truth I am going to tell. I have laughed myself at the same thing once.

When I heard something pop like a kiss, or thunder, I could not stand my heart thumps any longer. Curiosity and jealously got the uppermost end of me; I wanted to see for myself, so I slid out o' bed, sitting flat like a tailor on the floor; determined to hitch up jest as I sot, inch at a time, to the opening over the hearth, where the beam and gun hooks was. A cat couldn't be no stiller after a mouse; but my heart thumped louder every hitch, just as it will when a man goes to do what ain't right. Well, just as I had gained the right pint to look over at 'em, up flied the pesky floor, down I went, tow shirt to gun hook, and I there hung blind folded, like a squirrel hung on a rack, right over the fire, a-sweltering to death. I couldn't cry out, and it was more than ten minutes before he or she boss would look for me. I was hung about the line of the [illegible] and I spose [illegible]

I was pretty well baked, anyhow, and hain't been quite so raw since in matters of love. I never looked Jerusha in the face after that day, nor a gal in the neighborhood, for I could swear she told 'em all. The accident got my grit up to make a fortun. I went off a few miles and married the first chance I got, just out of spite, and Patsey is worth all 'em after all; and marrying is lottery business. Then don't hang yourself, as I did, because you can't get a particular one, but recollect your heart is like rubber, it will stretch a good ways and not break.

ALL NUTRIMENT OF VEGETABLE ORIGIN.—Nearly every one high and low, up to a few years ago, has believed that there was a difference between the nutritive parts of flesh-meat and those of other substances. Inquiry, however, has shown conclusively, that all nutriment whatever, is of vegetable origin. We see, for instance, that when we feed upon the body of a sheep, we do not gain anything peculiar, but simply the vegetable principles of the food upon which the animal fed. It was Liebeg who first pointed out this fact. He says that the "carnivora in consuming the blood and flesh of the graminivora, consume, strictly speaking, only the vegetable principles which have served for the nutrition of the latter." It is of great importance thus to have proved that there is nothing peculiar, in the flesh of animals, for even kreatinine is not peculiar, as you have the same principles in tea and coffee, and it is to this that these articles owe their stimulating qualities.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary [illegible] from the [illegible]

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty five thousand, of whom from three to five hundred have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours is always increased in the case of Fugitives to [illegible] Hence, the expense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and [illegible] them objects of compassionate interest.

Having strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from sickness, illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last [illegible] has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain ablebodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to [illegible]

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American [illegible] settlers of Canada are [illegible] peting as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour and as the progressive improvement of the colour population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemasons Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their [illegible] temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. G. GABRIEL, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

[illegible] the Rev. S. R. WARD, on behalf of the Fugitive Slaves on their arrival in Canada after effecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying the same into effect the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not [illegible] of July, 1854. The work [illegible] ance, to be at least equal to the [illegible] or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

[illegible] Communion and [illegible] to the exclusion, if possible, of other characters, without otherwise destroying the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other peculiarities of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character, and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the GOSPEL TRIBUNE his special study examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the SCRIPTURE MANUAL, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the strength of positions, and for the attainment of certain important information, but little of which he had previously been able to obtain. All may rest assured, however, that no undue advantage will ever be taken of the frankness and candor with which Christians of every name, as well as skeptics of every class, have freely expressed their convictions in the presence of the Travelling Colporteur; the capacity in which the Publisher is still extending his observations through Canada and the neighboring States.

CO-LABORERS:

Of distinguished worth and of well-known literary ability, are already secured in the several sections of Canada, and in the States of the American Union; and arrangements are now in progress, to obtain from living responsible writers in Britain, important assistance in the developement of the TRIBUNE'S Mission.

TERMS AND NOTICES:

The Terms are One Dollar per Annum in advance,—otherwise Two Dollars; it being found that one half of the Subscriptions, not paid in advance, are worse than lost. Editors—friendly—will render assistance by noticing this Prospectus. All parties willing to aid, may at once commence [illegible] the names of Subscribers. Two books of Scripture and Laconic Manuals—fully gilt, and the Paper one year, will be forwarded to the person who first sends the names of ten Subscribers; and one of either of the books, in substantial leather binding, or the Paper one year, to every one who sends ten names. Subscriptions and all [illegible] communications for the Paper to be sent, [illegible] addressed Money, (if inclosed) and address, ROBERT DICK, Box 411, TORONTO.

Sermons and Lectures, promotive of the TRIBUNE'S object, will be delivered by the Publisher throughout the Province as frequently as shall be found compatible with his other duties.

(Signed) ROBERT DICK.

Poetry.

Song of the Harvesters.

We gather them in—the bright green leaves,
With our scythes and rakes to-day,
And the mow grows big, as the pitcher heaves
His lifts in the sweltering bay.
O ho! afield! for the mower's scythe,
Hath a ring as of destiny,
Sweeping the earth of its burden lithe,
As it sings in wrathful glee.

We gather them in—the nodding plumes
Of the yellow and bended grain,
And the flash of our sickles' light illumes
Our march o'er the vanquished plain
Anon we come with the steed-drawn car—
The cunning of modern laws,
And the acres stoop to its clanging jar,
As it reeks its hungry jaws

We gather them in—the mellow fruits
From the shrub, and vine, and tree,
With their russet, and golden, and purple suits,
To garnish our treasury;
And each hath a juicy treasure stored
Amneath its tinted rind,
To cheer our guests at the social board,
When we leave our cares behind.

We gather it in—this goodly store,
But not with the mist of pride
For the Great All-Father who gave
Hath but given it in trust.
And our work of death is but for life,
In the wintry days to come
Then a blessing upon the sickle's sheen,
And a shout at his Harvest Home

Literature.

The Blind Man's Wreath.

"My boy, my poor blind boy!"

This sorrowful exclamation broke from the lips of Mrs. Owen, as she lay upon the couch to which a long and wasting illness had confined her, and whence she well knew she was never more to rise.

Her son, the only child of her widowed hearth, the sole object of her cares and affections, knelt beside her, his face bowed upon her pillow, for now only, in a moment of solemn communion with his mother, had she revealed the fatal truth, and told him she must soon die! He had watched, and hoped, and trembled for many weary months, but never yet had he admitted to himself the possibility of losing her; her fading cheek and sunken eye could not reveal to him the progress of decay, and so long as the loved voice maintained its music to his ear and cheered him with promise of improvement, so long as her hand still clasped his, he had hoped she would recover.

He had been blind since he was three years old; stricken by lightning, he had totally lost his sight. A dim remembrance of his widowed mother's face, her smoothly braided hair, and flowing white dress, was one of the few recollections entwined with the period before all became dark to him.

The boy grew up, tall, slender, delicate, with dark pensive eyes which bore no trace of the calamity that had destroyed their powers of vision; grave though not sad; dreamy, enthusiastic, and requiting his mother's care with the deepest veneration and tenderness. In the first years of his childhood, and also whenever his education did not take them to London and elsewhere, they had resided near a town on the seacoast, in one of the prettiest parts of England.

Independently of the natural kindness which very rarely fails to be shown towards any person who is blind, there was that about both the widow and her son which invariably rendered them acceptable guests; for their intellectual resources, and powers of conversation, were equally diversified and uncommon. Mrs. Owen had studied much in order to teach her son, and thus, by improving her natural abilities, had become a person of no common stamp; her intellectuality, however, being always subservient to, and fitly shadowed by, the superior feminine attributes of love, gentleness, and sympathy; for Heaven help the woman in whom those gifts are not predominate over any mental endowments whatsoever.

When they walked out together his mother took his arm; he was proud of that, he liked to fancy he was some support to her, and many pitying eyes used latterly to follow the figure of the widow in the black dress she constantly wore, and the tall pale son on whom she leaned confidingly, as if striving with a sweet deception to convince him that he was indeed the staff of her declining strength. But gradually the mother's form grew bent, her step dragged wearily along, and the expression of her face indicated increasing weakness. The walks were at an end; and before long she was too feeble to leave her bed, excepting to be carried to a summer parlour, where she lay upon a sofa beside an open window, with flowers twining around the casement, and the warm sunshine filling all things with joy, save her foreboding heart and the anxious son who incessantly hung over her. Friends often came to visit them, and turned away with deep sadness as they noted the progress of her malady, and heard the blind man ask each time whether they did not think her better—oh, surely a little better than when they had last beheld her?

Among all these, no friend was so welcome or brought such solace to the sick room as Mary Parker, a joyous girl of nineteen, one of the beauties of the county, and the admiration and delight of all who knew her. Mrs. Owen had danced Mary upon her knee, and Edward used to weave baskets and make garlands for her when he was a boy of twelve, and she a little fairy of six years old or thereabouts, stood beside him, praising his skill, and wondering how he could manage so cleverly though blind.—None of his childish companions ever led him so carefully as Mary, or seemed so much impressed with his mental superiority; she would leave those games of her playmates in which his blindness prevented him from joining, and would listen for hours to the stories with which his memory was well stored, or which his own imagination enabled him to invent.

As she grew up there was no change in the frank and confiding nature of their intercourse. Mary still made him the recipient of their girlish secrets, and plans, and dreams, just as she had done of her little griefs and joys in childhood; asked him to quote his favourite passages of poetry, or station herself near him at the piano, suggesting subjects for him to play, which he extemporized at her bidding. Bright and blooming as Mary was, the life of every party, beaming with animation and enjoyment, no attention was capable of rendering her unmindful of him; and she was often known to sit out several dances in an evening to talk to dear Edward Owen, who would be sad if he thought himself neglected.

And now she daily visited the invalid: her buoyant spirits tempered by sympathy for her interesting sufferings; but she could bring such an atmosphere of sunshine and hope around her, that gloom and despondency seemed to vanish at her presence. Edward's sightless eyes were always raised to her bright face, as if felt the magic influence it imparted.

His mother had noted all this with a mother's watchfulness; and, on that day, when strong in her love, she had undertaken to break to him the fact which all others shrank from communicating, she spoke likewise of May, and of the vague wild hope she had always cherished of one day seeing her his wife.

"No, mother, no!" exclaimed the blind man "Dearest mother, in this you are not true to yourself! What! Would you wish to see her in all her spring-time of youth and beauty sacrificed to such a one as I!—to see Mary, as you have described her to me, as my soul tells me she is, tied down to be the guide, and leader, and support of one who could not make one step in her defence; whose helplessness alone in the eyes of men, would be his means of sheltering and protecting her! Would you hear her pitied—our bright Mary pitied—as a Blind Man's Wife, mother!"

"But Edward—if she loves you, as I am sure she does—"

"Love me, mother! Yes, as angels love mortals, as a sister loves a brother, as you love me! And for this benignant love, this tender sympathy, I could kneel and kiss the ground she treads upon; but, beyond this—were you to entreat her to marry your blind and solitary son, and she in pity answered Yes, would I accept her on such terms, and rivet the chains she had consented to assume? Oh, mother, mother, I have not studied you in vain, your life has been one long self-sacrifice to me; its silent teaching shall bear fruit! Do not grieve so bitterly for me. God was very merciful in giving me such a mother; let us trust him for the future!"

Ah, poor tortured heart, speaking so bravely forth, striving to cheer the mother's failing spirit, when all to him was dark, dark, dark!

She raised herself upon her pillow, and wound her weak arms about his neck, and listened to the expressions of ineffable love, and faith and consolation, which her son found strength to utter, to sustain her soul.—Yes, in that hour her recompense had been great to both, in secret tears, with Christian patience and endeavour, with an exalted and faithful spirit, had she sown; and in death she reaped her high reward.

They had been silent for some minutes, and she lay back exhausted, but composed, while he sat beside her, holding her hand in his, fancying she slept, and anxiously listening to her breathing which seemed more than usually oppressed. A rustling was heard amid the flowers at the window, and a bright young face looked in.

"Hush!" said Edward recognizing the step, "Hush, Mary, she is asleep!"

The colour and smiles alike passed from Mary's face, when she glided into the room "Oh! Edward, Edward, she is not asleep, she is very, very ill!"

"Mary! darling Mary!" said the dying lady, with difficulty rousing herself; "I have had such a pleasant dream; but I have slept too long. It is night. Let them bring candles. Edward, I cannot see you now."

Night, and the sun so brightly shining!—The shadows of the grave were stealing fast upon her.

Other steps now sounded in the room, and many faces gathered round the couch; but the blind man heard nothing—was conscious of nothing, save the painful labored respiration, the tremulous hand that fluttered in his own, the broken sentences.

"Edward, my dearest, take comfort. I have hope. God is indeed merciful."

"Oh, Edward, do not grieve so sadly!—It breaks my heart to see you cry. For her sake be calm—for my sake too!" Mary knelt down beside him and endeavoured to soothe the voiceless anguish which it terrified her to witness.

Another interval, when no sound broke the stillness that prevailed; and again Mrs Owen opened her eyes, and saw Mary kneeling by Edward's side. They were associated with the previous current of her thoughts, and a smile lighted up her face.

"As I wished, as I prayed, to die! My children both. Kiss me, Mary, my blessing, my consoler! Edward, nearer, nearer!—Child of so many hopes and prayers—all answered now!" And with her bright vision unalloyed, her rejoicing soul took wing, and knew sorrow and tears no more.

Four months had passed since Mrs. Owen's death, and her son was still staying at Woodlands, the residence of Mary's father, Colonel Parker, at about two miles' distance from Edward Owen's solitary home; hither had he been prevailed upon to remove, after the first shock of his grief had subsided.

Colonel and Mrs. Parker were kind-hearted people, and the peculiar situation of Edward Owen appealed to their best feelings, so they made no opposition to their children devoting themselves unceasingly to him and striving by every innocent device, to render his affliction less poignant and oppressive.—But kind as all the family were, still all the family were as nothing compared to Mary, who was always anxious to accompany him in his walks, seemed jealous of her privilege as his favourite reader, and claimed to be his silent watchful companion, when, too sad even to take an interest in what she read, he leaned back wearily in his chair, and felt the soothing influence of her presence.

As time wore on, some of his old pursuits resumed their attractions for him she used to listen for hours as he [illegible] She would study with her own [illegible] subjects that he said, as her [illegible] on [illegible] would beg him to give her a lesson in expression and [illegible] and render it [illegible] feeling and [illegible] In the [illegible] in their readings, which gradually were carried on with more regularity and interest, she appeared to look upon herself as the person obliged, appealed to his judgment, and deferred to his opinion, without any consciousness of the fatigue she underwent, or the service she was rendering.

One day, as they were sitting in the library, after she had been for some time pursuing her self-imposed task, and Edward, fearing she would be tired, had repeatedly entreated her to desist, she answered gaily:

"Let me alone, Edward! It is so pleasant to go through a book with you; you make such nice reflections, and point out all the most passages, and explain the difficult parts so clearly that it does me more good than a dozen readings by myself. I shall grow quite clever now we have begun our literary studies."

"Dear Mary, say rather, endeed; for you know this cannot always go on so. I must return to my own house next week; I have trespassed on your father's hospitality, indulgence, and forbearance too long."

"Leave us, Edward!" and the color deepened in her cheeks, and tears stood in her bright eyes. "Not yet!"

"Not yet? The day would still come, dearest, delay it as I might, and is it manful thus to shrink from what must and ought to be? I have to begin life in earnest, and if I falter at the onset, what will be the result? I have arranged everything: Mr. Glen, our clergyman, has a cousin, an usher in a school, who wishes for retirement and country air. I have engaged him to live with me as companion and reader. Next week he comes; and then Mary, farewell to Woodlands!"

"No, not farewell, for you must come here very often; and I must read to you still, and you must teach me still, and tell me in your own noble thoughts and beautiful language of better and higher things than I once used to care for. And then our walks—oh Edward, we must continue to see the sunset from the cliffs, sometimes, together. You first taught me how beautiful it was. I told you of the tints upon the sky and upon the sea, and upon the boats with their glistening sails, and you set the words before me in all its brightness and loveliness, brought it home to my heart, and made me feel how cold and insensible I had been before."

"Ah, Mary," said Edward mournfully, "near you, I am no longer blind!"

The book she had been reading fell unheeded on the ground, she trembled, her color went and came, as she laid her hand timidly on his arm; indescribable tenderness, reverence, and compassion were busy within her soul.

"Edward, you will not change in anythings towards us; this new companion need not estrange you from your oldest and dearest friends—your mother's friends! Let me always be your pupil, your friend, your —Sister."

"Sustainer, consoler, guide! Sister above all, oh, yes, my sister! Best and sweetest title—say it again, Mary, say it again!" and seizing her hand he kissed it passionately, and held it for a moment within his own. Then as suddenly relinquishing it, he continued in an altered tone, "My sister and my friend, until another comes to claim a higher privilege, and Mary shall be for ever lost to me!"

She drew back, and a few inaudible words died away upon her lips; he could not see her appealing tearful eyes. Mistaking the cause of her reserve, he made a strong effect to regain composure.

"Do you remember when you were a child, Mary, how ambitiously romantic you used to be, and how you were determined to become a duchess at least?"

"And how you used to tease me, by saying you would only come to my castle disguised as a wandering minstrel, and would never sit at the board between me and the Duke. Edward? Yes, I remember it all very well, foolish children that we were! But I, at least know better now; I am not ambitious in that way any longer."

"In that way? In what directions then do your aspirations tend?"

"To be loved," said Mary fervently; "to be loved, Edward, with all the trust and devotedness of which a noble nature is susceptible—to know that the heart on which I lean has no thought save for me—to be certain that, with all my faults and waywardness, I am loved for myself alone, not for—for any little charm of face which people may attribute to me."

Edward rose abruptly, and walked up and down the room, which from his long stay in the house, had become familiar to him, "Mary," he resumed, stopping as he drew near her, "you do yourself injustice. The face you set so little store by, must be beautiful, as the index of your soul; I have pictured you so often to myself; I have coveted the blessing of sight, were it only for an instant, that I might gaze upon you! The dim form of my mother, as I last beheld her in my infancy, floats before me when I think of you, encircled with a halo of heavenly light which I fancy to be your attribute, and a radiance hovers round your golden tresses such as gladdens our hearts in sunshine."

"Ah, Edward, it is better you cannot see me as I am! You would not love—I mean you would not think of me—so much!"

"If I could but see you for a moment as you will look at the ball to-night, I fancy I should never repine again."

"The ball to-night! I had quite forgotten it; I wish mamma would not insist upon my going. I do not care for these things any longer;—you will be left alone, Edward, and that seems so heartless and unkind!"

"Mary," said one of her sisters, opening the library door, "look at these beautiful hot-house flowers which have arrived here for us. Come, Edward, come and see them too."

They were so accustomed to treat him as one of themselves, and were so used to his aptitude in many ways, that they often did not appear to remember he was blind.

The flowers were rare and beautiful, and yet no donor's name accompanied the gift. Suddenly one of the girls cried out laughingly, "I have guessed, I have guessed It is Edward! He has heard us talking about this ball, and must have ordered them on purpose for us. Kind, good Edward!" and they were loud in their expressions of delight; all except Mary, who kept silently aloof.

"Mary does not like her flowers?" said Edward inquiringly, turning in the direction where she stood.

"No," she replied sorrowfully, "it is the ball I do not like, nor your thinking about decking us out for it As if I cared to go.

"Look at these lovely roses," said the eldest sister, as they were selecting what each should wear, "would not Mary look well with a wreath of these roses in her hair?"

"Yes, yes," exclaimed Edward eagerly, "and let me weave it for her! You know, Mary, it is one of my accomplishments; you were proud of my garlands when you were a little girl. Will you trust my fingers for the task?"

"If you really wish it, if it does not seem too trifling, yes," said Mary gently, with a troubled expression upon her brow usually so serene, as she moved reluctantly away. "But it must appear such mockery to you, poor Edward!" and then without waiting for a reply, she hurried to her room, and did not show herself again until the family had assembled for dinner; while Edward, seated between the sisters who were in great delight in their anticipation of the evening's amusements, silently betook himself to his task.

Early after dinner, the large old-fashioned drawing-room at Woodlands was deserted; the momentous business of the toilet had to be gone through, and then a drive of five miles accomplished, before Mrs Parker and her three fair daughters could find themselves at the ball. Edward was the only occupant of the room; seated at the piano, on which fingers idly strayed, he now and then struck chords of deep melancholy, or broke into passages of plaintive sadness.

"Alone, alone! How the silence of this room strikes upon my heart,—how long this evening will be without her voice, without her footstep! And yet this is what awaits me, what is inevitably drawing near. Next week I leave the roof under which she dwells; I shall not hear her singing as she runs down stairs in the morning; I shall not have her constantly at my side, asking me, with her sweet child-like earnestness, to teach her to repeat poetry, or to give expression to her music. The welcome rustle of her dress, the melody of her laugh, will soon become rare sounds to me! Within, around, beyond, all is dark, hopeless, solitary. Life stretches itself wearily before me, blind and desolate as I am! Mother, mother, well might your sweet spirit shrink when you contemplated this for your miserable son!—How strange those last words! I thought of them to-day, while I made her wreath of roses, and when her sisters told me of the numbers who flock around her. Every flower brought its warning and its sting!"

"Edward, have I not made haste? I wished to keep you company for a little while, before we set out. You must be so sad? Your playing told me you were sad, Edward."

She was standing by him in all the pride of her youth and loveliness; her white dress falling in a cloud-like drapery around her graceful form, her sunny hair sweeping her shoulders, and the wreath surmounting a brow on which innocence and truth were impressed by Nature's hand.

The sense of her beauty, of an exquisite harmony about her, was clearly perceptible to the blind man; he reverently touched the flowing robe, and placed his hand upon the flowery wreath.

"Will you think of me, dearest, to-night? You will carry with you something to remind you of me. When you are courted, worshipped, envied, and hear on every side praises of your beauty, give a passing thought to Edward who lent his little help to its adornment."

"Edward, how can you speak so mockingly! You know that in saying this you render me most miserable."

"Miserable! With roses blooming on your brow, and hope exulting in your heart; when life smiles so brightly on you, and guardian angels seem to hover round your path!"

He spoke in a manner that was unusual to him; she leaned thoughtfully against the piano, and, as if unconscious of what she was doing, disengaged the garland from her hair.

"These poor flowers have no bloom, and this bright life of mine, as you think it, has no enjoyment when I think of you, sad, alone, unhappy, returning to your desolate home, Edward."

"Dearest," he returned, inexpressibly moved, "do not grieve for me. Remember my mother left her blessing there!"

"Was it only for you, Edward?"

There is a moment's silence; he covers his face with his hands, his lofty self-denying spirit wrestles with himself: when gently the wreath is laid upon his knee, her arm is passed around his neck, her head with its glory of golden locks is bowed upon his breast

"Oh, Edward, take the wreath, and with it take myself if I deserve it. Tell me that you are not angry, that you do not despise me for this—I have been so unhappy, I have so long wished to speak to you.—

"Mary, Mary, forbear! You try me beyond my strength; beloved of my soul, light of my sightless eyes, dearer to me than language can express, you must not thus throw yourself away."

He would disengage the arm that is clinging to his neck, but she nestles closer still.

"Mary!" he cries wildly, "remember! Blind, blind!"

"Not blind near me; not blind for me. Here, Edward, here my resting place is found; nothing but death shall separate me from you, I am yours, your friend, your consoler, your wife. Oh, tell me you are glad.

Glad! His previous resolutions, his determination to owe nothing to her pitying love, all faded in the unequalled happiness of that hour, nor ever returned to cloud the life which Mary's devotion rendered henceforth blessed.

This is no fiction, reader, no exaggerated picture; some, who peruse this, will testify out of the depth of their hearts how, in respect and admiration, they have watched Mary fulfilling the promise of her beautiful sympathy and love. She has never wavered in the path she chose to tread; she has never cast one lingering look at all she resigned in giving herself to him. Joyous, tender, happy, devoted, she has seemed always to regard her husband as the source of all her happiness; and, when the music of children's voices has been heard within their dwelling, not even her motherly love for those dear faces whose sparkling eyes could meet and return her gaze, has ever been known to defraud their father of a thought, or a smile, or the slightest portion of her accustomed care.

No, dear Mary! Years have passed since she laid her wreath on his knee; the roses so carefully preserved, have long withered; but the truth and love which accompanied the gift, are fresh and bright as then: rendering her, as her proud husband says, almost equal even while on earth, to those Angels among whom, in Heaven, he shall see her—SEE her, at last, no longer blind!—Dickens' Household Words.

THE VALUE OF TIME.—Says a French exchange:—There is an honest citizen residing in the street Louis-le-Grand, at Paris, who enjoys an income of 25,000 francs and has a wife and four children. He has six clocks in his sitting-room, which mark the days, the months, and the years, besides the hours and minutes. The first of those clocks began to run at the time of the old gentleman's birth, and marked the other day, 54 years, 8 months, and 14 days. The second is for the wife. The third is allotted to the eldest daughter, who yesterday reached the age of 21 years and 17 days. The fourth, fifth, and sixth clocks mark the ages of the other children. The object of those clocks is to indicate at each hour of the day to the person for whom they run, how rapidly time flies, and how fast the stream of life flows toward eternity. It is a great moral lesson mechanically demonstrated.

EXPERIMENT.—Those who rail at poetry and refinement as superflous ingredients in every-day happiness, little know what main props they seek to undermine. These will abide when even principles waver. Manly delicacy is as necessary in family life as manly rectitude; and womanly tact as womanly virtue. There is much happiness wrecked from the absence of the one as from the absence of the other. Those who neglect the varnishes of life, commit an insidious sin towards themselves; and these lie in the mind and not in the purse.

PAPER FROM WOOD.—We recently announced that the Ledger was being printed on paper made principally from straw, under a patent which proposed to make it from any fibrous vegetable substance. We are now writing upon foolscap paper of a very fine quality, made from wood, at Lee, Massachusetts, by Patner and Smith. These experiments in paper-making are made necessary by the scarcity and high price of cotton and linen rags, which have advanced so much that newspapers can scarcely afford to be published at their former rates, the cost being so heavy. If wood, straw and other fibrous substances, of a cheaper price, can be made to supply the deficiency of rags, every branch of the printing business will be relieved of an onerous expense, and some of our farmers will receive handsome prices for that which now is, comparatively speaking, of but little value to them.—Ledger.

Memory Quickened in Drowning.

The following circumstance, vouched for as true, is one among many instances in which the memory has received a remarkable quickening in apparent drowning. Such facts are incontestible; the solution has never been satisfactorily given:

"Some years since, A held a bond of B for several hundred dollars, having some time to run. At its maturity he found that he had put it away so carefully that he was unable to find it. Every search was fruitless. He He only knew that it had not been paid or traded away. In this dilemma, he called on B. relating the circumstance of its disappearance, and proposed a receipt as offset to the bond, or rather indemnifying bond against its collection if ever found.

"To his great surprise, B not only refused to meet the terms of difficulty, but positively denied owing him anything and strongly intimated the presence of a fradulent design on the part of A. Without legal proof, and, therefore, without redress, he had to endure both the loss of his money and the suspicion of a dishonorable intention in urging the claim. Several years passed away without any change in the nature of the case, or its facts, as above given, when one afternoon while bathing in ——river, A, either from inability to swim, or cramp, or some other cause, was discovered to be drowning. He had sunk and risen several times, and was floating away under the water, when he was seized and drawn to the shore. The usual remedies were applied to resuscitate him, and although there were signs of life, there was no appearance of consciousness. He was taken home in a state of exhaustion, and remained so for some days.

"On the first return of strength to walk, he left his bed, went to his book case, took out a book, opened it, and handed his long lost bond to a friend who was present. He then informed him that when drowning and sinking, as he supposed, to rise no more, in a moment, there stood out distinctly before his hand, as a picture, every act of his life, from the hour of childhood to the hour of sinking beneath the water, and among them the circumstance of his putting the bond in the book; the book itself and the place in which he had put it in the book case. It is needless to say that he recovered his own with usury.

"There is no doubt that this remarkable quickening of memory results from the process which in such cases is going on—the extinguishment of life. It is somewhat analagous to the breaking in of the light of another world, which in so many well attested cases of death bed scenes, enables the departing spirit, even before it has absolutely left its clay tenement, to hold and exult in the glories of the future state. Is it not a fair inference, that when the soul shakes off the clogs and encumbrances of the body, it will possess capacities for enjoyment of which on on earth it was unsusceptible?

"As regards the memory, it will be observed by most persons, how readily in life we forget that which we do not desire to remember, and in this way we get rid of much unhappiness. Can we do this after death? This is an important and practical question."—Cist's Advertiser.

THE FAMOUS HORSE TAMER.

Among the amusing episodes of the existing state of things, is that a lady, described as being a person of strictly feminine manners—Madam Isabel—is appointed, by the special recommendation of the Emperor, to superintend the manege of the cavalry. This lady, it appears, in addition to a sort of intuitive knowledge of the points of a horse, has made herself so perfectly acquainted with the morale of the animal, that by aid of some very simple mechanical contrivance she is able in the course of some fifteen or twenty lessons, to bring into the most lamb-like subjection horses whose restive character has bid defiance to every known military art. She has just returned from St. Petersburg, where, for the last two years, she has been superintending the Czar's cavalry, an office which she left to the great regret of the Emperor, of whom she has brought away many substantial tokens of approbation. She only resigned when war was declared. She is now being employed in the regiment of Guides, where her progress is said to be wonderful. She has the art of imparting her knowledge with such ease and facility, that she has no need to take an active part in the necessary arrangements; and her manners are so charming and unpretending, that Captain Queprette, the Captain Instructor of Cavalry, and Colonel Fleury, Colonel of the Guides, yield to and carry out her suggestions without any injury to their amour propre. It is impossible to describe the slight machinary employed; but the principle on which Madame Isabel founds all her system is, suavity and gentleness, no violence.

LONDON, July 28, 1854.

COMMITTAL FOR NOT TAKING AN OATH.

Lord CONGLETON wished to call attention to the case of a lady who had been committed by Mr. Justice Wrightman for refusing, from conscientious scruples, to take an oath. He wished to know whether a judge had no other alternative than to commit in such a case. He also wished to know whether the measure which the noble and learned Lord had brought into that House would remedy this evil.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said as the law stood, if a witness refused to be sworn, he committed a contempt of court, and a judge had no other alternative than to commit him to prison. The bill, however, which their Lordships had passed, and which he hoped would soon become the law of the land, would completely remedy this evil, as it provided that any person who had a conscientious scruple to take an oath, might make a solemn declaration. (Hear.)

Lord CAMPBELL hoped that measure would become law. In the case referred to, if the party refused to take an oath from conscientious scruples, he should only have imprisoned her for ten minutes.

The Youthful Offenders' Bill, the Convict Prisons (Ireland) Bill, and some other measures, were passed through committee.

SALE OF BEER BILL.

The Bill was read a third time.

On the motion that the Bill do pass,

The Earl of HARROWBY proposed amendments to extend the hours during which public house may remain open on Sundays from between one and two in the day to between one and half-past two, and from six and ten in the evening to beween five and eleven in summer and between five and ten in winter, in accordance with the notice given by the noble Earl on the previous day.

Lord REDESDALE considered that while 300,000 personswent out every Sunday upon pleasure excursions, it would be difficult to interfere with the means of providing them with refreshments. Their object should be to combine as far as possible consideration for the necessary requirements of these people with regard for public order. There was, however, this difficulty in dealing with the matter—that while in the large towns from which the excurtionists proceeded in the morning, and to which they returned probably late at night, the hour of ten or eleven o'clock might be too late to allow refreshments to be supplied to them, it might be altogether too late in the country.

The Earl of HARROWBY moved his first amendment, that five o'clock be substituted for six as the hour at which public houses might open in the afternoon.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY expressed a very decided objection to the motion. As the bill was originally introduced, the hours were from six to nine in the evening, subsequently a compromise was entered into with the consent of all parties, and the hour for closing was extended from nine to ten, and in that shape the bill was passed by the Commons, and sent up to their Lordships. Now, it was proposed to extend the period by three hours altogether—that was from six to nine, to five to eleven, which would give six consecutive hours, during which these public houses might remain open every Sunday evening, so that the positive restriction which would be gained, as compared with the existing law, after all the exertions which had been made, was two hours and a half—viz., from half-past two till five. He trusted that their Lordships would not sanction any such change in the bill—at least before they saw the very important evidence which had been taken by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. For himself, he must say that nothing would give him greater pain than that, by introducing these amendments, their Lordships should defeat the whole object of the bill as introduced into the other House, and that it should be said the House of Lords had less consideration for the wishes of the people than the House of Commons.

The Bishop of LONDON knew that the best possible effects had followed from the change in the law which he had been instrumental in carrying some years ago, whereby public houses were kept closed until one o'clock on Sunday morning, and he believed it was the experience of the great social benefits which had resulted from the change, which had been the cause of so many petitions being presented in favor of the further restriction proposed by this bill. He considered that four hours on the Sunday evening was quite sufficient to allow persons to resort to public houses and places of amusement. There was no hardship in the case; on the contrary, the restriction would compel those who frequented such places to spend more time at home with their wives and families. As they diminished the hours for drinking in public houses, the more they would increase the comforts of the people, and of the working classes especially. (Hear, hear.)

The Marquis of CLANRICARDE urged that recreation was necessary for the health of the people, and the Sunday was the only day upon which, as a general rule, they could avail themselves of the means offered them for obtaining it. While they were permitted to obtain that recreation in the most innocent way possible, he could conceive nothing more absurd or unjust than to deny them that refreshment of which they stood in need. (Hear, hear.) It was not to be supposed, that, because public houses were open an hour or so longer, people would remain in them if they did not require refreshment. It had been said that travellers had a right to be supplied with refreshments on the Sunday; but the whole grievance turned upon the want of a definition of the word "traveller;" and the inconvenience of these restrictions would be still experienced as it was now by persons who were at a distance from their homes, and who, according to the decision of some magistrates, were not to be considered as travellers.

Their Lordships divided—

For the Clause as it stood...	24
For the Amendment.....	15
Majority	9

Six o'clock consequently remains as the hour at which public houses may open on the Sunday evening.

The amendment, extending the hours for public houses remaining open at noon from 1 to 2, to 1 to half-past two, was agreed to. Some other amendments were introduced during the absence of strangers, but what they were could not be ascertained, and the bill passed.

The Reformatory School (Scotland) Bill, the Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction Bill, the Stock-in-Trade Exemption Bill, and the Common, &c., Rights (Ordnance) Bill, the Land Revenues of the Crown (Ireland) Bill, the Highways Public Health Bill, and the Public Libraries Bill were severally read a third time and passed.

Laying a Submarine Telegraph to Connect Europe and Africa.

On the 21st inst., was performed the ceremony of inaugurating the laying down of the cable of the submarine telegraph, which is to unite Europe to Africa, and no doubt to India. The Persian with the cable, 110 English miles in length, weighing nearly 900 tons left Genoa the night before at a quarter past ten, following the steam frigate La Constituzione on which had embarked his Royal Highness Prince Carignan, the French Ambassador, Duc de Guiche; the English Minister, and other public functionaries. The steamers Malfattano and Tripoli, which had been by the Government placed at the service of the Director-in-chief, Mr. John Brett, had preceded the two above mentioned steamers some time before. At half-past four a. m., anchor was cast at about 400 yards from the spot fixed on to receive the end of the cable, an exceedingly lovely spot at the mouth of the river La Magra, on a recess of a small promontory called St. Croce, opposite the mountains of Carrara, 3 miles distant from Levici and twelve from Spezzia. The moment the Persian arrived were begun the preliminary operations for sinking the cable. At about half-past eight all was ready, and a boat with about 450 yards of cable approached the place where part of the company were already standing, and the remainder with the Prince soon came. At exactly 9, the Prince took the cable and accomplished the ceremony of laying it down, the two war steamers firing a salute of 21 guns each. That was all; not a word was pronounced, nor any other preparation whatever made. Count Bonelli, the director-in-chief of the land telegraph, had the previous night met with a serious accident. No more than nine persons besides the official cortege were present at the ceremony. The direct line from the bay of Santa Croce, where the cable is fixed, to Cape Corse, is 75 English miles. The cable will be cut at Cape Corse, and laid down again on the other side of the island, at the strait of Bonifacio, to unite Corsica to Sardinia. The length is about ten miles, and with the courses by land in those two islands and the sea-line, from St. Croce to Cagliari, there will be a complete line of about 600 miles. Next month of September this line will be extended by another cable of 150 miles in length to Bona in Algiers.

First of August in England.

A great Anti-Slavery Conference was held at Manchester, England, on the 1st inst. Strong resolutions were adopted for the immediate and total abolition of slavery and the slave trade, deprecating the acquisition of Cuba by the United States, urging emancipation there as the best means for frustrating the same, &c. George Thompson was the prominent speaker. "Prince John" was not present. Further particulars hereafter.—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

Increase in the Strength of the Nation.

In 1821 the number of males in Great Britain under 20 years of age and the number above 20 was nearly equal. The increase in the young population (under 20) since 1821 has been rather more than 2,500,000; the increase in the adult population (above 20) has been more than 4,000,000. The males at the soldier's age of 20 to 40 amounted to 1,966,664 in 1821, and to 3,193,496 in 1851; the increase in the 30 years is equivalent in number to a vast army of more than 1,200,000 men. While the population under 20 increased 37 per cent., the population between 20 and 40 increased 60 per cent. Assuming, as may be fairly assumed, that the population under the age of 10 years, and the great bulk of the population of the age of 70 and upwards, are chiefly sustained by the industry of the population living in the middle period of life, extending from the age of 20 to the age of 60, it will be found that in 1821 the 6,367,991 persons of the middle age sustained 4,355,166 children and old persons, or 68 per cent of their number; while in 1851 only 5,797,295 ineffectives by age [57 per cent,] were sustained by 10,082,296 of effective population. Tested by these facts, the strength of the nation has increased faster than its numbers.—Census Report.

Scotland Under-Peopled.

Allowing for the coldness of the northern climate, as well as for the necessary sterility of the hills, on the one hand, and on the other, for the salubrity of the air, for the energy of the inhabitants, for the mineral wealth, for the adaptation of the country, covered by water-power in its mountain streams, to furnish healthy sites of manufactures and towns of various kinds, the conclusion appears to be inevitable, that Scotland is under-peopled, and that its resources have not yet been developed to the same extent as the resources of England.—Census Report.

The building for the Paris Universal Exhibition of 1855 is of stone externally, and the contract was taken by Messrs. Goldsmid & Co., at 11,327,000f. M. Viel is the architect. There will be two wings, which will cost 6,000,000f. more, and various temporary buildings. The main structure is a parallelogram in three spans, about 820 feet long, and 354 feet broad. The width of the centre span is 157 feet, and the height in the centre 108 feet. The gallery will stand over the whole width of the side divisions, about 79 feet.—The Builder.

House of Commons.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL CANADA BILL.

August 4th.

The House met at noon.

Mr. Peel moved the second reading of the Legislative Council Canada Bill. He described it as a proposition for enabling the Legislature of Canada to alter the fundamental state of the Legislative Council, and to obtain, or to change, the organization of that body as the Legislature might deem fit. The measure fully expressed the public opinion of the people of Canada, and was entirely approved of by Lord Elgin, the Governor General of the province—Sir J. Pakington objected to the measure on two grounds—first, because it sanctioned institutions of an extremely democratic character; and, secondly, on account of the manner in which it had been brought under the consideration of the Parliament. He had given notice to move as an amendment, that it should be read a second time that day three months; but as it would be absurd to suppose that the thirty or thirty five members present represented the House of Commons, he should not press it.—Mr. Adderley, Mr. Hume, Sir G. Grey, Mr. V. Smith and Lord J. Russell having expressed their approval of of the measure, Mr. F. Scott moved the adjournment of the debate, and it was adjourned until six o'clock accordingly.

On re-assembling, the debate on the Legislative Council Canada Bill was resumed by Mr. Biggs, who supported the bill, believing that a more, stringent measure would have the effect of separating the colony from the mother country.—The amendment was then negatived without a divison and the bill was read a second time.

Much that is written us, is illegible;—please write plainly.

☞ We have been directed to say that the Rev. J. B. Smith is not an authorized agent for this paper.

The young friend who wrote us from Chatham, is informed that we have just been supplied with a boy; his letter, we are sorry to say, came too late; though we doubt not he might be able to get employment in a printing office in this city,—we shall hold him in remembrance.

DR. E. P. CHRISTIAN.—The young man is still at work in this office. He has written to his friends frequently, and will visit them soon.

The friend who wrote us from Suffolk Co., L. I., presumes too much on our forbearance. He must have known when he ordered the Freeman, that he would be at the expense of the postage; neither can we be so accommodating as to send papers free of charge to friends, just long enough to publish their contributions in writing, and then stop them; we do not believe newspapers were designed for that,—at all events, the Freeman is not. We are always pleased to have our friends write; but how long will the Freeman live at that rate? If gentlemen do not know what they do, and order the paper, we have no right to suppose so, so we invariably send the paper when told to, but, to have us humour their whims, is something we must decline, especially, as we are left to pay their postage.

A Visit to Niagara, C. W.

Having a leisure moment, and wishing to introduce the Freeman to the good citizens of this thriving little town, we stepped on board of the beautiful steamer Peerless, on the 16th, and in a very few hours found ourselves enjoying the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Warner Johnson. Having made our errand known, the friends came nobly forward, both white and colored; and we now give our readers the gratifying assurance, that so far as Niagara "is concerned," the paper has nothing to fear. Mr. Resin Williams, a well-known and enterprising farmer of that District, and to whom we shall ere long refer in connection with other voluntary donors in Canada, to the paper, since its commencement, had been actively engaged canvassing for names, and from him we received additions to the subscription list, including the most influential gentlemen in the town.

On Thursday evening, at a meeting of colored citizens, held in the Baptist Church, which was necessarily small, as our people make but an inconsiderable part of the population, a Tea Meeting, for the Freeman, was unanimously resolved upon, and the names below are of members to the Toronto "Union."

Niagara is a beautifully situated town, very healthy, and rapidly rising into importance. The colored citizens are prosperous—nearly every family possessing a homestead—there is no prejudice. Lots can be had on reasonable terms, and tradesmen, laborers, &c., are in active demand. Niagara, Bronte, and other towns and villages near Toronto, offer great inducements just now to men of small capital, or to those who prefer pure air, cheap rents, and abundance of labor, to the unhealthy atmosphere, and uncertain chances of a large city.

Members of the "UNION" in Niagara:—Robert Gains, Warner Johnson, Wm. H. Scott, Rev. Francis Lacey, George Washington, James Lewis, Rebecca Washington, Margaret Merrick, Sarah Scott, Mary Harvey, Priscilla Harvey, Martha J. Beale, Clara Johnson. *

Personal.

For the past few weeks, Toronto has been visited by a number of our brethren of the States, mostly ministers. Not long since, the A. M. E. Conference was in session here, from which cause, there was for the time, a large accession of clerical talent. We regret that absence from the city prevented a full account of the very interesting meetings held by them; but, late as is this period, we may say, for the information of our readers abroad, Bishops Quinn and Payne, and the clergymen by whom they were surrounded, made a most favorable impression on the minds of our citizens. The evidences of progress in the ministry of that connexion, are unmistakeable. The past week, Elder Richard Vaughn, of the Baptist Church, Philadelphia, and Elder Adam Driver, of the Israel Methodist Church of the same city, were on a collecting visit, mainly, but also looking out the beauty of the country.—From their report to their fellow-citizens, we hope much, both to themselves and to Canada. *

THE FEMALE EMIGRANT'S GUIDE; OR, HINTS ON CANADIAN HOUSEKEEPING.

We would refer our readers to the advertisement of the work now in Press, with the above title, by Mrs. Traill, to be found in another column. Judging from the high commendation of it, made by the Old Countryman—from Mrs. Traill's known reputation as an author—and from the matter it is designed to contain, it will be found to be a valuable "guide" to the emigrant, and a very important addition to English literature.

☞ In answer to several inquiries, we are able to announce that Mr. Bovell Hope, has many cleared farms to be rented or sold, and many thousand acres of Wild Land in every part of the Upper Province.

Correspondence.

To the Provincial Freeman:

DEAR SIR:—I have seen an account in Frederick Douglass' paper, of a visit of his to that ever-memorable place which has been productive of so much strife and discord, on the part of the colored people of this country, I mean the Dawn. After giving a glowing description of that part of Canada through which he passed, which he might have long since seen with advantage to our people, had he condescended to have visited it sooner, he goes on to tell about what he, Mr. J. Scoble and father Henson did. Among other things he tells us how father Henson was treated, and has the impudence to show a disposition to enter into the controversy, in justification of those against whom we have had to contend so many years for our right. This subject has been sufficiently irritating to us, without insult being added to injury, at the hands of a foreigner, who knows nothing of our grievances in his matter, only so far as he is informed by designing parties, who desire to enlist him in a crusade against the colored people in this country; and he seems willing enough to do their dirty work for filthy lucre sake. "He, father Henson, was treated, everywhere, with marked respect," says Mr. Douglass. Does Mr. Douglass mean to tell us that the Dawn is everywhere. Father Henson, no doubt, commands a certain kind of respect at the Dawn, growing out of the pecuniary position he has acquired there by his agency in its affairs. But Mr. Douglass needs not think to palm off that kind of respect for that acquired by those whose acts flash light all around them, so that every body may see that their doings are open and honest, without suspicions, and who command respect at home and abroad.

Mr. Douglass speaks as if the people of Dawn represented all Canada. He also informs us that "father Henson" was appointed President of the day; and this, with other trifles of the day, he parades before the public, as proof against the justice of the complaints made by the coloured people of this Province agains: "father Henson" and other managers of the Dawn. From what I have before witnessed of Mr. Scoble, I am led to believe that he concerted the plan of the presidency of the day, for the very use Mr. Douglass is now making of it. I remember father Henson went to England to beg more money for the Dawn, in addition to the large sums already collected and squandered. A rumour followed him, which made it necessary for him to return, accompanied by Mr. Scoble, to find out its truth or falsity. There seemed to be, however, a stronger desire on the part of certain ones to make it appear false than to get at the real facts of the case. Mr. J. C. Brown, for some cause or other, was suspected as the principal author of the said rumour; through him then, an opportunity offered to get the resemblance of a public expression against the charges made, on this side, and so let them go to England, and lull the misgivings of the good people there, who were ready to give, if all was right. About that time the North American Convention assembled in Toronto; but how to get the matter before that body, required some skill and tact to be used, for it was not likely that the Convention would formally take the matter up. But Mr. Scoble, who seemed to have charge of it, was equal to the task. Henry Bibb, who, doubtless, was privy to the whole plan, which I have reason to believe was previously concocted, was by a move of that party appointed President of the Convention. The next move was from the same party, by which power was given him to appoint a Committee to nominate officers to the Convention. Then comes the sequel of Mr. Scoble's manœuvres. Messrs. Scoble, Henson and others, equally available for carrying out the desired object, were appointed a Nominating Committee; hence, among the names, that Committee reported for the acceptance or rejection of the Convention, was Mr. J. C. Brown. Then a motion from the same party, to take each name separately, which was done, and as soon as Mr. Brown's name came up, Mr Scoble, who was one of the leading members of the Committee, and who must have had as much to do with putting Mr. Brown's name on the list as any other member of the Committee, opposed his election as an officer of the Convention, in a set speech, as the author of the charges against Mr. Henson, shewing clearly that it was all a preconcerted scheme to drag Mr. Brown's name before the Convention, to have it rejected, that it might go to England, and so clear the way for a revival of the "begging" scheme of the Dawn. Until the £6,250, or, $25,000, which was acknowledged in 1847, at the Drummondsville Convention, to have been collected for the Dawn, is satisfactorily accounted for, Mr. Douglass may prate about respect, this way, and that, but it will all go for nothing among honest and straight-forward people. I, with many others, hoped that after a process of begging and raising large sums of money had been carried on without the consent and contrary to the wishes of a majority of the colored people of this country, after so many years of disgraceful operations, without the least benefit accruing to those for whose advantage it was pretended to have been set on foot, that it would have been suffered to remain in its defunct state. But it seems that is not to be the case, according to the following, from F. Douglass' Paper:

"Mr. Scoble is now making special efforts to render the Dawn practically, what it was intended to be, by its early patrons."

Hence, Mr. John Scoble wants his assistance to neutralize the just opposition on the part of the colored people of this Province, to a revival of the begging scheme of the Dawn, which is believed to be more speculative than philanthropic; also, to prevent them from giving a free and independent expression of their feelings and opinions upon all matters affecting their interest; for which services, doubtless, he is to have a fair remuneration. Hence, for this purpose, Mr. J. Scoble has been pleased to make an open attack upon the Freeman, a paper established by the colored people as the organ through which they may convey their opinions of matters and things in general.

Why did not the self-constituted managers of the Dawn make it what its early patrons intended it should be, while they were obtaining £6,250 or $25,000—a school, "accessible to such of our people as escape from Slavery into Canada?" The answer is obvious—a portion of them were too intent upon their own gain, an opportunity for which presented itself in that ill-fated concern. But that sentence is calculated, and perhaps intended by Mr. D. to create a false impression abroad, that the colored people in Canada were shut out from the schools in this Province, of which there are many provided by law, which in this glorious country knows no difference on account of complexion? The same may be said with regard to the other places of learning; for instance, there are several colored youths in the Upper Canada College, who are looked upon with special favour by their excellent teachers, in the various branches of learning, on account of their proficiency in their studies.

This, Mr. Freeman, is only a glance at the designs of Messrs. Scoble, Douglass and others, on the colored people. In my next, the Lord willing, I shall enter into a more thorough investigation of their designs; therefore, I shall call this No. 1.

Yours, respectfully,

A DESCENDANT OF THE AFRICAN RACE.

Toronto, Aug, 15th, 1854.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman:

MR. FREEMAN,—I will, as I intended to do, give your readers some of the matters of the Dawn Celebration. It was given out some days beforehand, by Josiah Henson, in Chatham, and the people were told that Mr. Scoble would submit the plan of the Dawn Institute. Before this announcement of Mr. Scoble's, I was taken very ill, and not expected to live; the people of Dawn on hearing it, became quite uneasy; so a number visited town, and said that if I would come out they would bring a carriage down for me. Mr. Scoble, Mr. Geo. Cary, and myself and daughter started about the same time. I saw them when they crossed the bridge: it may be that they did not see me; but it did appear to me that they did not want to. When I arrived there, it was circulated in the neighbourhood that I was not able to come out nor write out. At 10 o'clock, being near the time of day to begin, several persons said that if I spoke there that day, I would be put in jail! However, the people assembled, and after appointing Josiah Henson, Chairman, Mr. Frederick Douglass addressthe audience for about two hours. Mr. Scoble followed. He attempted to get up the feeling of the meeting by clapping his hands, but there was no response. At this time dinner came: I proposed to my friends as the day was getting short, and myself being quite unwell, that I thought it advisable to leave for Chatham; the friends thought as soon as I left, Mr. Scoble would bring his question forward. Finally, about 5 o'clock, the Rev. Wm. King got up and addressed the audience in one of his animated strains, and said much to the purpose: during the time of recess, which followed, there was a gentleman called on Mr. Scoble to read a notice to the audience, that there would be a service in the evening, at 7 o'clock; this he refused to do, stating his reason, the colored people were all prejudiced against him, and he would have nothing to do with them. Mr. Douglass made a second appearance on the stage, and commenced trying to raise the old dim coals. I asked my friends what was the matter, as I had been to many a fine meeting in Dawn; what caused the appearance of this one to be so dim? They said that the people doubted their veracity. By this time Douglass was near getting through his second heat, now rubbed and curried off, but no purse won.

A little past 6 o'clock, Mr. Scoble ascended the platform; he tells us of his new scheme he intends to adopt for educating the children; he considers the property of Dawn as much the white man's, as he does the colored man's. He had promised the Trustees, that so far as he could, he would carry out the spirit and letter in good faith; this he now repudiates in toto,—stating that he only brought the plan forward, but it was not for their approval or disapproval. After stepping back from the front of the platform, stated that he had submitted all except a secret, which was not for them to know. Perceiving him though, I arose, and asked the Chairman if I would be permitted to make a few remarks. He replied, I could not, unless I would confine myself to the question of the Emancipation of the West Indies. George Cary, to my great surprise, had some sparks of humanity left in him, he cried to let Mr. Brown say whatever he thought best. I commenced by saying, as there were broad axes cutting out large abolition chips, they might not think hard of seeing a tomahawk or hatchet cutting at a small knot; I further stated to my friend Douglass, that I thought his memory was very short—that he should have his alphabet close by him, as he did not state on that platform the correct duration of abolitionism; that he had stated that it was in 1829, when the first abolitionist came out. To correct that mistake, I stated that there were three came out nine years before that; the three went into Texas to look out a location for the colored people of the western country. J. C. Brown being one of the party, he considers himself an evidence. I then went on to show Mr. Scoble that he was not proposing to carry out the objects for which the Dawn was intended; and I, as a Trustee of the Dawn, would not submit to any proposition advanced by him. I then gave an opportunity to any person or persons to ask me any question they might feel disposed to ask me. Josiah Henson, ever ready to attack his adversary, but not wise enough, said he would prove to the congregation, the false representations I had made respecting my being appointed a Trustee at London, some 14 years ago, of the Dawn Institute; for he was prepared to say, that my name was not called in that Convention. He called on George Johnson, to know where he received his appointment, for he stated he did not know, unless it was at London. From this statement, I replied to the audience, that I could prove that Josiah Henson was guilty of the most gross falsehoods of any person on that ground; that he had gone to England about three years ago; that he was sent there as the tried, faithful servant of the Dawn Institute; he there printed and published a book, expecting these lies would gain him great profit; he stated in that book, that he had colonized seven thousand souls to Dawn. I called upon the audience to record the fact, if they knew of three he ever had moved into Dawn, excepting of his own family, and if so, they would please to stand on their feet; but none arose, and the Rev. Chairman took his seat, and if he has since arisen, I do not know, for I left about that time. When I arose to answer Mr. Henson, Mr. Scoble rose up, as if to entangle me; Mr. Myers told him that no gentleman would act so, and that he considered him no gentleman, and to take his seat.

I informed the people that I was in possession of written documents of the doings of the public of Dawn for many years, and I should give the public the benefit of those doings. This, and other matter, to be continued.

Yours, respectfully,

J. C. BROWN.

To the Provincial Freeman:

MR. M. A. SHADD:

DEAR SIR,—I have taken the liberty to send you a few more names for the Provincial Freeman. This paper is of much benefit to the cause of Emancipation, especially among the pro-slavery party-men. What I wish to say is this: Whenever I get into an argument with those crazy-headed bull dogs, as I have to call them, for they act more like them than than they do like human beings, I throw out a copy of your paper, and tell them that a colored man publishes such a paper in Canada, and that the fugitives are better off in a cold climate, than in a warm one under slavery, from their own words, &c.

May the Lord bless you, brother Shadd!

Yours truly, for the Slave,

C. S. DEPP.

Niles, Michigan, July 30, 1854.

REMARKS.

Friend Depp has our sincere thanks for the great interest he takes in the success of the Freeman, and also for his faithful exposition of the views of the fugitives; may others do likewise!

As our friend is under a misapprehension when addressing us, as are many besides, a mistake occasioned, no doubt, by the habit we have of using initials, we would simply correct, for the future, our error, by giving, here, the name in full, (Mary A. Shadd) as we do not like the Mr. and Esq., by which we are so often addressed.

For the Provincial Freeman.

Public Meeting.

A called Meeting of the colored citizens of Toronto, was held in the Richmond Street Chapel, on Wednesday evening, the 24th inst., to take into consideration the speech of Rev. Mr. Dall, delivered by him on the 1st. of August in Massachusetts, U. S.

Mr. Basil Rankin, was appointnd Chairman for the evening, and Josephus R. Brown, Secretary.

After the reading of the speech, by the Secretary, Mr. Resin Williams, of this city, Mr. T. Smallwood, Rev. Samuel Lewis, and others, then addressed the Meeting, in a forcible manner, taking exceptions to the speech of Mr. Dall, as being false in many particulars, and unfair towards the colored people.

Mr. Phillips took slight exceptions to the general tone, respecting Mr. Dall, but after a reply from Mr. Smallwood, and further remarks by Mr. Samuel Lewis, who was at the time Chairman, explaining Mr. Dall's knowledge of the Patrick Snead Meeting; and also from Mr. Williams, he, with the assembly, united in passing unanimously the following Resolutions:

Resolved, That the statements of Mr. Dall, in his speech in Massachusetts, U. S., with regard to the disposition of the old colored settlers, in this Province, towards the newly arrived fugitives, is a serious reflection on their character; and his statements about the Snead affair is false, and has a tendency to make differences between us.

Resolved, That the attempt of Mr. Dall to divide us into two classes in Canada, by calling attention to us as free and fugitive, is a wanton invasion of our kindred and social ties.

Resolved, That we are one people; our interests in those Provinces are the same, and that we will resist any and every attempt to sow discord amongst us.

Voted—That the Minutes of this Meeting be sent to the Provincial Freeman for publication.

On motion, the Meeting adjourned.

BASIL RANKIN,
Chairman.
J. R. BROWN,
Secretary.

REMARKS.

By way of correction to a statement made by us in our last, respecting the donors to the Patrick Snead Fund, we would state, that Mr Samuel Lewis, referred to in the preceding Minutes, and 30 years a resident, gave £1 10s.; and Mr. Resin Williams, also alluded to, gave £1 5s., a resident more than 20 years; others gave smaller sums. *

The War in the Baltic.

Invasion of the Crimea by the Anglo-French and Turkish Army, of between 80,000 and 100,000 men.

The Times says—We are at length in a condition to present to the public something more than speculations and surmises on the movements of the Allied armies in the East. About the time we write, if not on this very day; a force made up of English, French, and Turks, and amounting to between 80,000 and 100,000 men will invade the Crimea, and attempt to effect a lodgment on the heights commanding the harbour of Sabastapol. The preparations have been some time in progress, and the rumoured visit of Generals Brown, Canrobert to the Circassion coast, with 500 men, was really to secure a landing on the Crimea. It is then with the greatest satisfaction that we now announce an enterprise corresponding to the dignity and resources of the two great western powers, England and France, and so far justifying the confidence of Turkey. A fortnight will probably elapse before any tidings of the result can arrive, but at an earlier date we shall learn from the East that all the disposable forces have embarked for the neighbourhood of Sabastapol. It is possible that the attack may degenerate into a blockade; and, if we only persevere, we must ultimately starve out the garrison of this proud fortress; but we hope to report an end to the affair long before it comes to that pass; and with the forces at our disposal, there is no reason why every stone and every plank in the fort should not be at the mercy of the allied armies in a very few weeks or even days. We may then if we please hold the Crimea against the Russians as long as it may answer our purpose to retain a material guarantee.

Narrow Escape of the Czar from being Captured by an English War Steamer.

The Times, in a leading article, gives an interesting statement of an incident which might easily have been turned to account in the capture of the Emperor Nicholas and part of the imperial family. An English yacht belonging to Lords Lichfield and Euston had ventured so near to Cronstadt that a Russian steamer put out to sea with the intention of cutting her off. A war steamer, seeing the danger to which the yacht was exposed, advanced with all speed to her relief, and soon obtained such a position that the yacht was saved. This being accomplished, the commander of the English steamer put her head around, although the little Russian steamer could easily have been captured had he known that on board of this Russian vessel were the Emperor Nicholas his son, the Archduke Constantine, the Archduchess, his wife, and the Russian Admiral.

BERLIN, Friday.—The Western Powers have formally rejected the Russian proposals and made their own, which will likely form the subject of conference at Vienna; but it is improbable that Russia will accept them.

THE EASTERN WAR.—It is confirmed that the expedition against the Crimea and Sebastopol had left Varna. Nothing certain in regard to Boomersand has been received, except that it is about to be bombarded, and the Aland Island taken.

Acquitted Murders in Kentucky.

There have been scores of notorious cases of murder and acquittal in this city and this State.

There was the case of Kunz, who killed Schaeffer. Kunz, hearing that Schaeffer had spoken lightly of a member of his family, went to his coffee-house and cursed him. Schaeffer picked up a small stick and went around the counter as if to strike Kunz, whereupon the latter thurst a deadly weapon into his breast and killed him. He was tried and discharged without punishment.

There was the case of Delph, who killed his uncle, Rueben Liter. Delph armed himself deliberately, and went to the upper market house to meet Liter. He met him, sought a quarrel with him, and shot him dead on the spot. The quarrel was about a prostitute. Delph was tried and acquitted by a jury.

There was the case of Croxton, who killed Hawthorn. Hawthorn was in a coffee-house, sitting in a chair, drunk and asleep. Croxton struck him on the head in that condition with a brick-bat, and killed him. He was acquitted by a jury.

There was the case of Peters, who killed Baker. In Natchez, a long time before, Baker, in a fight had wounded Peters and made him a cripple. Peters being thus disabled, Baker supported him. The latter, after about a year became very poor, and discontinued his bounty. Thereupon, Peters pursued him to this city, rode in the night in a hack to his house, sent the hackman to inform him that a gentleman and friend wished to see him on business, and when Baker came out and stood in the window of the hack, shot him dead instantly. Peters was acquitted by the jury, and lived here for some years afterwards—long enough indeed to murder, or to try to murder a prostitute, upon whose bounty he subsisted.

There was the case of the Pendergrasts, who killed Buchanan, a school-master. The elder Pendergrast, with two of his sons and a negro, went to Buchanan's school house with loaded guns and killed him, without giving him a chance for his life. The jury gave a verdict of acquittal.

There was the case of Shelby, who killed Horine in Lexington. The two dined at the same public table, and, upon Horine's going into the street, Shelby demanded of him why he had looked at him in such a manner at the table. Horine answered that he was not aware of having looked at him in any unusual manner. Shelby said—"You did, and if you ever do it again, I will blow your brains out. I don't know who you are." Horine responded—"I know you, and suppose a man may look at you, if your name is Shelby." At that, Shelby struck him with his fist, and, without any return of the blow, and without any display of a weapon by Horine, for he was unarmed, Shelby shot him dead. Shelby was indicted, but the jury found no verdict against him.

There was the case of Harly Daniel, of Mt. Sterling, who killed Clifton Thompson. Daniel and Thompson were lawyers, and brothers-in-law. Thompson made some imputation upon Daniel in open court. Daniel drew a pistol and shot him dead in presence of judge and jury! Thompson had a pistol in his pocket, but did not draw it. Daniel was acquitted by a jury!

Does the Louisville Journal publish this list to serve as a palliation of its own errors, in defending and approving the Hardin county Jury, which acquitted WARD? Whether or not this be its intention, the effect will be to call public attention to a state of society, without a parallel, or the approximation to a parallel, in all the world's history. Will it be believed that in any one State, in the great Confederacy, wherein the daily boast is, that laws are respected and the rights of the humblest citizen regarded, will it be believed that in the State of Kentucky, the home of all honor and chivalry, the laws are more contemned, and the lives of honest men less protected, than in the most barbarous nations of the East?—Such a state of things appal, while it disgusts, and we shrink from the consideration of a code of morals like that exposed by these facts, as from the details of a savage massacre, or the particulars of an outrage upon some female innocence:

> "Can such things be,
> And overcome us like a Summer cloud,
> Without our special wonder!"

It was time that the people and the press from one extremity of the land to the other knew how much of guilt and horror was concealed behind that spacious vaunty of Kentucky Chivalry! It need some crime darker, more brutal and less pardonable than all preceding it, to attract the alarmed attention of the world to such a condition of society. Why, a man's life in Kentucky, is not worth the calling together of a jury; the forms of law, in cases of murder, are mere mockery and children's sport, there, in the centre of boasted refinement and luxury. "The dark and bloody ground" is not yet washed white; the old reputation of crime and guilt should still attach to it.

Let this list of murder unavenged by justice be circulated far and wide; let the public voice, speaking out of the public sense, stigmatize it as it deserves, the State that can approve and sustain such a condition of public morals. Then there may grow out of this WARD case the only good possible to result from flagrant guilt—the correction and abolishing of that monstrous wrong, the legalization of murder. God knows it is time.—Buffalo Democrat.

THE SLAVE TRADE.—The Maryland Colonization Herald says:—"The slave trade direct from Africa to the United States has been for some time suspended, but indirect, or through Cuba and Texas, it has at times been tolerably active—at least, we have the avowal of one of the principal actors in the operation for it. Pedro Blanco, next to De Susa, the largest slave trader on the West Coast of Africa for the last forty years, assured us, in 1838, that the United States was his best market, through the west end of Cuba and Texas. Upon our expressing doubt as to his statement, he offered to produce his correspondence with citizens of Florida, Louisiania and Arkansas, and other States direct. We declined knowing any more of the matter. It was enough to have recently seen the harbor of Sierra Leone filled with condemned American bottoms, built in Baltimore, the names and persons of the contractors but two well known to us.—Anti-Slavery Reporter.

CLOSE WORK.—The Niagara Falls Iris, of yesterday, says that a slave escaping from servitude arrived in that village, on Tuesday evening, and reached the ferry just in time to get into the little boat as it was preparing to start for the Canada side. His master was on the same train in pursuit, and reached the ferry only in time to see his chattel midway across the foaming waters of Niagara. We learn that the slave was last seen by his master at Cleveland; yet, although both were on the same trains, the slave succeeded in eluding his vigilance, and placing himself beyond pursuit.

The Methodist Church South.

☞ Some of the religious societies whose houses of publication are located in northern cities, have been converted into anti-slavery propagandism. In tracts of a purely religious character, abolition sentiments are interpolated and diffused through the South. This characteristic achievement of Yankee cunning has suggested to the General Conference of the Methodist Church South, the necessity of the establishment of a Book Concern, which, being the control of the southern men, will be made an instrument for the diffusion of a sound southern sentiment. The administrative talent of Smith, Early and Ralston, affords a sufficient guaranty that the scheme, if undertaken, will be successfully carried out. One instance of triumphant experiment would induce imitation, and ultimately all the religious communities of the South would become the efficient champions of southern interests.—Southern Argus.

A Fair Fugitive.

The editor of the Vermont Tribune gives a thrilling account of a fugitive slave who has just been passed through Vermont to Canada. He says:—

"She is twenty years of age, tall, well informed, and of far more than ordinary intelligence, able to read fluently, a member of the Methodist Church, and a daughter of her Master! Yes, she was running away from her own father, Ruffia Gilchrist of Easton, Md., because he sold her to a South Carolinian for $1.100. This ruffian had sold his own flesh and blood for so much hard cash, and but for his daughter's shrewdness and heroism would now have been fingering the price of blood. Charlotte, the fugitive ran away, lay secreted in the woods eighteen days, found a friend in Baltimore, who sent her to a Quaker in Philadelphia by railroad, by a mode we dare not tell lest it should involve him in trouble.—Her long exposure and dreadful journey to Philadelphia brought on a fever, from the effects of which she had not recovered when here at St. Albans; from Philadelphia to Boston by sea, thence to Maine, and then, to avoid some bloodhound southerners who were on her track, she turned her steps this way, avoiding her pursuers with consummate address, and finding excellent friends all the way, good accommodations on the U. R. R, with money given her here, she went on her way to the only land where she could breathe free. God protect and guide her!

ACCIDENT—SLAVES IN KANSAS.—A despatch in the Platte Argus, dated at Kansas on the 21st of July, says that some time in the afternoon of the previous day, Judge Walderman, in the pursuit of a runaway negro when attempting to dismount from his horse, discharged his gun, and eight buck and sixteen goose shot penetrated his body. He died the same night.

Provincial.

Slanderers of Canada.

Our paper of the 20th of May recorded, with approbation, the spirited way in which arrangements were made to celebrate the Queen's Birth Day at St. Catharines. The Constitutional announced, and we believe in sincerity, that such a celebration would well become "the most populous and wealthy town in the old Niagara District, pre-eminently the scene of many glorious struggles in defence of that Throne and Crown Britons always feel proud to rally round!!" Well, indeed, did St. Catharines respond to this appeal! Assured of this we read with surprise a communication from thence of some scribbler who signs himself "Victor." Men of St. Catharines, where is the man who will endorse the trash and slanders about you and your Town, which we almost blush to reprint?

"Openly and undisguisedly, liberty, independence of the mother country, annexation to the United States, is talked in the streets and canvassed in the quiet rooms.—Concession after concession has been granted to her Canadian subjects, but like children tasting sweets, these subjects want more. They want to be freemen in the widest sense of the word—to be placed on a political and commercial level with their neighbours across the Lake and River. The Reciprocity Treaty, just confirmed, gives great satisfaction—as well it might, since it allows Canada to launch her products into our markets to her infinite convenience and profit—but even this measure has only augmented the dissatisfaction at any restraint to their prosperity. Canada must be free, and will be ere five more years are numbered. No Parliamentary tactics, no Ashburton diplomacy can stay the tide of feeling now clamoring for republicanism, and the good-natured Queen must lose her heretofore loyally tax paying Canadian subjects. It is enough to know that Yankees are everywhere throughout these Provinces—that the people recognize them as good authority, and worthy of imitation, to be assured that the next treaty will legislate this part of the universe into the arms of Brother Jonathan—always providing that fugitive slaves shall remain unmolested, for Canada swears a bitter oath that these poor exiles shall never be harmed again."

"Liberty—independence—clamoring for republicanism!!" No Briton wrote these words—no honest American will adopt them. It is an infamous and unmitigated slander. Never was liberty in its highest and holiest sense more prostituted than in Canada, by a section of its Press, hallooed on by the leading journals of Upper Canada! We have too much liberty!!

The anonymous assassin of character plies his unholy trade unchecked Every coarse epithet which can be found or invented is used to vilipend and insult the man who does not belong to the PARTY to which the "Penny-a-liner," gives his present adhesion.

The ragged male vagabonds who infest the streets have "liberty" to curse and no one chides—the half-naked female is forced to steal the firewood for their precarious meal, because the bread-winner's wage is spent on untaxed whiskey—the trading politician who has not yet got his price, has "liberty" to write and speak, and lead you to infer that he is the most sinless of all God's creatures, and that every one else is a "chiseller," a "swindler," a "lying humbug"—Old Countryman.

Great Conflagration in Chatham.

About 12 o'clock last night, the cry of fire resounded in all parts of our town, and on proceeding to the spot, we observed the tannery of Mr. John Smith enveloped in one sheet of flame; from thence it extended to the wooden buildings in front, occupied by Mr. Smith as a saddler shop, and by Messrs. Smith & Co., as merchants, which were in a few minutes reduced to a heap of burning ruins. The extensive warehouse and storehouse in rear of Messrs. W. & W. Eberts' shop soon caught, and from thence the fire rapidly spread to the latter building, to save which every effort was made to no purpose.

On the left, the large brick building of Messrs. Eberts & Robinson, occupied by those gentlemen. and by Mr. John E. Brooke, on the ground floor as general merchants, by Messrs. McLean & Duck, as a law office, and by the Kent Advertiser printing establishment, was also in a few minutes reduced to ashes, scarcely allowing the occupants time to remove any part of their goods.—From this, the flames swept with fearful and irresistible rapidity through the several wooden buildings adjacent, and by the unremitting exertions of the firemen they were finally stayed at the house of Messrs. Smith & Lambert, merchant tailors. The south end of the bridge caught fire from the tannery, from which the flames in a few minutes rolled across the river, causing the total destruction of this work.

Fortunately the night was calm, scarcely a breath of air moving, otherwise it is impossible to estimate the extent of the destruction which would have ensued. As near as we can ascertain, the estimated losses of the several parties are as follows: Messrs. W. and W. Eberts, £10,000, insurance £4000: the Corporation, from the destruction of the bridge, £1000, insurance £500; Smith & Co., £1000, fully insured; John Smith, £750, no insurance; Messrs. Eberts & Robinson £7500, insurance £3500; John E. Brooke, £4000, insurance £1200: Messrs. McLean & Duck's law office, no insurance: Thomas Ireland's printing establishment, £400, no insurance. The losses of the parties occupying the shops west of Messrs. Eberts & Robinson's, we have not ascertained, but they must be considerable.

This is the most destructive calamity with which our town has ever been visited. In fact, King St., this morning, is laid in smoking ruins. There is no doubt at all, but it is the work of an incendiary, the flames could not have otherwise caught where they did.—Chatham Planet.

COLLISION ON THE G. W. RAILROAD.—Yesterday a freight train and the regular passenger train came into collision on the eastern division of the Great Western railway. No lives lost; locomotives badly injured. Mismanagement somewhere.

DESTRUCTIVE FIRE.—We learn with regret that the whole block of stores, storehouses, &c., on the Main Street, Chatham, is now one mass of smouldering ruins. The splendid bridge across the Thames is also destroyed. The fire took place early this morning. Loss immense No further particulars.—Middlesex Prototype, July 16.

HONESTY AND GRATITUDE.—On Monday morning a young lad picked up on Princess Street, an old handkerchief with £20 in bank bills rolled up in it The boy made enquiries, and at length found the owner, in the shape of a long-faced looking Yankee farmer, residing not many miles from Mill Creek, who, on receiving the parcel, put his hand in his pocket and presented the honest little fellow with one penny! Very liberal, very.—Kingston Herald.

Poetry.

Anti-Slavery Song.

The Pilgrims are launched on the wil Winter main,
The wild dark or the foam madly tossing;
The compass is light, but as clouds they sustain;
They've left the long lines of tyranny's sceptre and chain,
It is Liberty's sea they are crossing.
Loo, brings their cry o'er the stormy wave,
"Freedom, death, or bondage
Freedom, or ocean our grave

Borne high on the breath of the soft Summer gale,
The slave ship is proudly careering,
What signals of despair and what voices of wail!
What anguish and sadness betoken that fair sail,
To hopeless captivity steering!
Hark! hark! from the black-hold the stifled cry,
"Freedom! death or freedom!"
Hear how it rings the sky!

In the darkness and rain of the chill Autumn night
The slave from the cane-field is striding;
Through hunger and hardship he urges his flight,
No bloodhounds affright him, nor bloodhounds affright,
By the North-star his weary feet guiding.
Help! help! for him! answer his eager cry,
"Freedom! freedom! freedom!"
The morn that rescue is nigh.

Up! up with your banners to honor the brave!
Over your forefather's tombs be they flying!
And hail to the hero, though black and a slave,
Who shrinks from oppression, but fears not the grave,
And throws off his fetters by dying.
Join, join in the shout that he flings on high,
"Freedom! death or freedom!"
Join, 'twas your forefathers' cry!

Constitution of the Provincial Union.

ARTICLE I.

We, the undersigned, associate for the purpose of carrying out the following Pledge :—

BELIEVING in the necessity of measures to further promote literature, general intelligence, active benevolence, the principles of universal freedom, and a British union not based on complexional considerations, and in the imperative duty now resting upon us to thwart the plans now maturing to array one class of Her Majesty's subjects against another, and increasing class, on the grounds of the complexional characteristics and origin of the latter, we pledge ourselves to do all in our power in our associated capacity, as Members of this Union, and in our private capacity, as citizens,—1st: To promote a healthy harmony, and to diffuse a loyal spirit among those of Her Majesty's subjects with whom we may associate, or come in contact. 2nd. To encourage and support a Press, or those Presses, in Canada, which will stand on the watch-tower to notify the citizens of this country against the unjust imputations, reflections and designs of many in the United States and this country, who would carve out a policy for emigrants, formerly bond, and free, different from white emigrants who may and do settle herein, by counselling the former to be a "good peasantry" for the latter as their highest ambition; or to aggregate themselves into exclusive communities, or to look upon the West Indies as the home for the mass, in preference to the free soil of Canada; thereby promulgating the dangerous doctrine that God's children, of different complexions, cannot live together under the protection of the British Lion, in British America, unless those of darker hue, become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to those of white complexion. 3rd. To do all in our power to remove the stain of Slavery from the face of the earth, and particularly, as subjects of Great Britain, to check its progress in America by all legitimate means; and, 5th. To encourage the rising generation in literary, scientific, and mechanical efforts. 6th. As a nucleus of operations, to support the "Provincial Freeman," as our organ, so long as it may be found to advocate sound principles, and to use our ability to promote objects in connexion with it, to further honest endeavours in this direction.

ARTICLE II.

For the better success of the above measures, the Parent Society shall consist of a President, a Vice-President, Recording and Corresponding Secretaries, Treasurer, and a Committee as extensive as the number of signatures to the Pledge.

ARTICLE III.

The annual fee of each male member shall be 2s. 6d. c'y.

ARTICLE. IV.

The Female Members shall organize a Committee, with a Moderator, Secretary and Treasurer; and the annual contribution for each member, shall be 1s. 3d.

ARTICLE V.

The object of the Ladies' Committee shall be to prepare articles for an Annual Fair, to be held in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Chatham and other large cities and towns, at which auxiliaries may be formed; also, to devise other measures for promoting the specific object; namely, the support of the people's organ, the Provincial Freeman.

ARTICLE VI.

Auxiliary Societies may be formed in each town, city, or village, in which parties may be found to take as their basis the Constitution of this Society, provided that they, at their option, make such local arrangements as the peculiarities of the case require.

ARTICLE VII.

The officers of this Society shall be elected annually, and at each annual meeting, one or more persons shall be empowered to assist in forming auxiliaries, and in whatever way the interests of the Society may demand.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Ladies' Committee shall meet every Monday evening, for the purpose of making up articles, useful and elegant; and to them shall be entrusted the details of their plans.

ARTICLE IX.

A monthly meeting of members, both male and female, shall be assembled for the purpose of promoting the literary objects specified by recitations of original pieces, reading, debates, &c. Twice in the year at the semi-annual and annual meetings parties shall be solicited to address the Society.

ARTICLE X.

This Constitution can be altered at the Annual Meeting, by a vote of a majority of members present, and the addition of the votes from each auxiliary society, through delegates from the same, provided, that at whatever place the Annual Fair may be held, the Annual Meeting shall be held for the time being.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern Free States. At any point, however, they may be dragged back by the Courts and upon almost summary process, sent back to endless misery and woe. Even the ordinary rights are always insecure in case of Fugitives to operate as a warning to them. Hence during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal, liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. Ward, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony,—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B Gribble, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. Thomas James, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

PRESIDENT.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

TREASURER.

It was moved by the Rev. J. Wemberley, Rector of Dorrington, seconded by the Rev. George Wilkins, and adopted:—

"That the best thanks of this Meeting be presented to the Earl of Shaftesbury, for his kindness in presiding on the present occasion."

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1854, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Business Relations—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plans adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches auxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 12. A member of the council shall be member of only one of the committees thereof.

Art. 13. All officers holding funds, shall give security in double the amount likely to be in their hands. This security to be given to the three first officers of the council.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper government

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the rest of the American people.

THE GOSPEL TRIBUNE.

PROSPECTUS.

The first number of a monthly paper, to be known as above indicated, is proposed to be published in Toronto within a few months, and not later than the First day of July, 1854. The work in size and appearance, to be at least equal to the Missionary Record or Christian Observer; and as much superior to either in style and execution as the subscription list will warrant.

DESIGN AND OBJECT

To enlarge the limits of Communion and Church Membership, among Christians, to the greatest possible extent; and to circumscribe those bounds to the exclusion, if possible, of all other characters, without otherwise disturbing the Membership of existing Churches; till acknowledged Christian Character shall constitute the only passport, at any time, and the perfect passport at all times, to every Communion and Church worthy of the Christian name; "that the world may believe" in Christ, even as he prayed.

GENERAL OBJECTS:

The promotion of Religious, Moral, Intellectual and Social improvement, under the guidance of Divine Revelation, submitting every move and measure to the test of Gospel Principles.

SUPPORTERS:

The distinctive and general objects of the work are such, as to claim for it the patronage of all classes of men, excepting those wedded to other pre-requisites of Communion and Church-membership, than acknowledged Christian Character; and here it is recorded with great pleasure that the encouragements tendered, thus far, are in strict accordance with the above general claims.

ORIGIN AND PROGRESS:

This movement has long been contemplated. For twenty years the subscriber has made the distinctive object of the Gospel Tribune his special study: examining carefully and personally the denominational aspect of Religious Societies,—their reciprocal bearings, their mutual relations, and the nature of their combined influence on the evangelization of the world. Latterly, his position as Publisher of the Scripture Manual, has probably afforded him the best possible facilities for personally testing the str

Poetry.

Up and be Doing.

Up and be doing! aye, be resigned,
Ne'er so dejected and pale;
Man with an intellect—man with a mind!
What does your sorrow avail?
Fear in the bosom and tears in the eye
Never drive evils away:
Manfully struggle, earnestly try,
Up and be doing to-day!

Up and be doing! gaols way be won
By persons of every sphere;
Deeds of affliction and love may be done
Every day in the year.
Onward! whilst science is shedding her stores,
And light from her portals is streaming;
Upward! the lark that at heaven's gate soars
A lay of thanksgiving is hymning!

Up and be doing! win a great name,
Purchase broad lands of your own;
Steep is the eminence leading to fame,
Thorny the path to renown.
Thorny and steep the one may be climbed,
The other as easily trod,
By him who with wisdom his actions has timed,
Who centres his trust upon God.

Up and be doing! murmurs and sighs,
Drive them uncourteously hence;
Search after knowledge—learn to be wise,
Think of your shillings and pence.
Poetry, fiction, and day-dreams of bliss—
All very well in their way—
Are not the right tools for a workshop like this
Up and be doing to-day!

Literature.

John Bunyan.

In the edition of "The Encyclopædia Britannica, or Dictionary of Arts, Sciences, and General Literature," we have [says the Dublin Nation] a short biography of Bunyan, which in a few pages presents that quaint old worthy as a breathing figure. The strength, humour, grace of style, liberty of tone, keenness of perception, and thorough relish for the subject manifest in the writing of this little memoir, indicate plainly enough the owner of the signature, T. B. M., by whom the "Encyclopædia" has been in this case enriched.

Mr. Macaulay represents vividly the boy, John Bunyan, born tinker, with a powerful imagination and keen sensibility, excited by religious terrors, growing up to a tormented youth. Of the depravity and profligacy commonly attributed to him, on his own testimony, as characteristic of his tinker days, so far as such words have a real meaning in our own ears, he is here proved guiltless. His four chief sins were dancing, ringing the bells of the parish church, playing at tip-cat, and reading the history of Sir Bevis, of Southampton. Another sin, indeed, is named, which appears somewhat more real to us, but his habit of swearing was cured by one reproof. "A rector of the school of Laud," Mr. Macaulay observes, "would have held such a young man up to the whole parish as a model. But Bunyan's notions of good and evil had been learned in a very different school; and he was made miserable by the conflict between his tastes and his scruples."

At seventeen Bunyan enlisted in the Parliamentary army, and served during the campaign of 1645. Then it was that his imagination became stored with those impressions of the pomp and circumstance of war, which furnished afterwards so many of his illustrations, and supplied him with his Great-heart, his Captain Boanerges, and his Captain Credence. The campaign over, he went home and married. And then his fancy again became the prey of the religious excitement and fanaticism prevalent; and his terrors, temptations, and self-accusations bordered on insanity. As he grew older, reason strengthened, and a spirit of sound sense got vigour enough to subdue, or nearly to subdue, the wildness of these fantasies. He joined a Baptist Society at Bedford and after a time began to preach; yet we are told it was long before he ceased to be tormented with an impulse which urged him to utter words of horrible impiety in the pulpit.

With the Restoration there came persecution of Dissenters, and Bunyan's well-known imprisonment in Bedford jail lasted, with some intervals, during twelve years. He was told that if he would give up preaching he would be set free, but not even his strong domestic affections tempted him from the path that seemed to him the path of duty. He had several small children, and among them a blind daughter, whom he loved with peculiar tenderness. "He could not, he said, bear even to let the wind blow on her; and now she must suffer cold and hunger; she must beg; she must be beaten; 'yet,' he added, 'I must, I must do it.'"

That he studied during the imprisonment the Bible and the Book of Martyrs, and that he there began to write, all the world knows In his first writings he had not found his whole power, but at last he began the "Pilgrim's Progress," a work of which Mr. Macaulay thus strikingly relates both the history and character:—

"Before he left his prison he had begun the book which has made his name immortal. The history of that book is remarkable. The author was, as he tells us, writing a treatise, in which he had occasion to speak of the stages of the Christian progress. He compared that progress, as many others had compared it, to a pilgrimage. Soon his quick wit discovered innumerable points of similarity which had escaped his predecessors. Images came crowding on his mind faster than he could put them into words, quagmires and pits, steep hills, dark and horrible glens, soft vales, sunny pastures, a gloomy castle, of which the court yard was strewn with the skulls and bones of murdered prisoners, a town of bustle and splendour, like London on the Lord Mayor's day, and the narrow path, straight as a rule could make it, running on up hill, and down hill, through city and through wilderness, to the Black River and the Shining Gate. He had found out, as most people would have said, by accident, as he would, doubtless, have said, by the guidance of Providence, where his powers lay. He had no suspicion, indeed, that he was producing a masterpiece. He could not guess what place his allegory would occupy in English literature; for of English literature he knew nothing. Those who suppose him to have studied the Fairy Queen might easily be confuted, if this were the proper place for a detailed examination of the passages in which the two allegories have been thought to resemble each other. The only work of fiction with which he could compare his Pilgrim was his old favourite, the legend of Sir Bevis of Southampton. He would have thought it a sin to borrow any time from the serious business of his life, from his expositions his controversies, and his lace tags, for the purpose of amusing himself, with what he considered merely as a trifle. It was only, he assures us, at spare moments that he returned to the House Beautiful, the Delectable Mountains, and the Enchanted Ground. He had no assistance. Nobody but himself saw a line until the whole was complete. He then consulted his pious friends. Some were pleased; others were much scandalised. It was a vain story, a mere romance, about giants, and lions, and goblins, and warriors, sometimes fighting with monsters, and sometimes regaled by fair ladies in stately palaces. The loose, atheistical wits at Will's might write such stuff to divert the painted Jezebels of the court; but did it become a minister of the Gospel to copy the evil passions of the world? There had been a time when the cant of such fools would have made Bunyan miserable. But that time was passed, and his mind was now in a firm and healthy state. He saw that, in employing fiction to make truth clear and goodness attractive, he was only following the example which every Christian ought to propose to himself; and he determined to print.

The "Pilgrim's Progress" stole silently into the world. Not a single copy of the first edition is known to be in existence.—The year of publication has not been ascertained. It is probable that, during some months the little volume circulated only among poor and obscure sectarians. But soon the irresistible charm of a book which gratified the imagination of the reader with all the action and scenery of a fairy tale, which exercised his ingenuity by setting him to discover a multitude of curious analogies, which interested his feelings for human beings frail like himself, and struggling with temptation from within and from without, which every moment drew a smile from him by some stroke of quaint yet simply pleasantry, and nevertheless left on his mind a sentiment of reverence for God and of sympathy for man, began to produce its effect. In puritanical circles, from which plays and novels were strictly excluded, that effect was such as no work of genius, though it were superior to the Iliad, to Don Quixote, or to Othello, can ever produce on a mind accustomed to indulge in literary luxury. In 1678 came forth a second edition with additions; and then the demand became immense. In the four following years the book was reprinted six times. The eighth edition, which contains the last improvements made by the author, was published in 1682, the ninth in 1684, the tenth in 1685. The help of the engraver had early been called in; and tens of thousands of children looked with terror and delight on execrable copper plates, which represented Christian thrusting his sword into Apollyon, or writhing in the grasp of Giant Despair. In Scotland, and some of the colonies, the pilgrim was even more popular than in his native country. Bunyan has told us, with very pardonable vanity, that in New England his dream was the daily subject of the conversation of thousands and was thought worthy to appear in the most superb binding. He had numerous admirers in Holland, and among the Huguenots of France. With the pleasures, however, he experienced some of the pains of eminence. Knavish booksellers put forth volumes of trash under his name, and envious scribblers maintained it to be impossible that the poor ignorant thinker should really be the author of the book which was called his.

He took the best way to confound both those who counterfeited him and those who slandered him. He continued to work the gold-field which he had discovered, and to draw from it new treasures, not indeed with quite such ease and in quite such abundance as when the precious soil was still virgin, but yet with success which left all competition far behind. In 1684 appeared the second part of the "Pilgrim's Progress." It was soon followed by the "Holy War," which if the "Pilgrim's Progress" did not exist, would be the best allegory that ever was written.

The fame of Bunyan during his life, and during the century which followed his death was indeed great, but was almost entirely confined to religious females of the middle and lower classes. Very seldom was he during that time mentioned with respect by any writer of any great literary eminence. Young coupled his prose with the poetry of the wretched D'Urfey. In the "Spiritual Quixote," the adventures of Christian are ranked with those of Jack the Giant Killer, and John Hickathrift. Cowper ventured to praise the great allegorist, but did not venture to name him. It is a significant circumstance, that, till a recent period, all the numerous editions of the "Pilgrim's Progress" were evidently meant for the cottage and the servant's hall. The paper, the printing, the plates, were all of the meanest description. In general, when the educated minority and the common people differ about the merit of a book, the opinion of the educated minority finally prevails. The "Pilgrim's Progress" is perhaps the only book about which, after lapse of a hundred years, the educated minority has come over to the opinion of the common people.

Miscellaneous.

Employment of Women in France.

I am induced to say a word upon the very numerous employments open to females in France, which are not open to them at home. The books of nine-tenths of the retail shops in Paris, are kept by women. I do not remember a cafe or estaminet in the city, the counter of which is not presided at by a woman. The box offices of all the theatres are tended by women—not only those of the evening, but those open during the day for the sale of reserved places. The box-openers and audience-seaters are women. And not only do women act as sellers in such establishments as are naturally fitted to them, but even in groceries, hardware stores, wood-yards, fruit stores, butcheries, etc., etc. In all these places the book-keeper is a woman, fenced in and separated from the rest by a frame-work of glass.—The ticket sellers at the railroad stations are principally women. I have the pleasure of purchasing a seat daily of a good-looking young person of about twenty-four years.—From appearances, I should say she was engaged to the conductor of the four o'clock train. Women even guard the stations and some of the less frequented crossings. Women cry the rate of exchange, every afternoon, after Bourse hours, and more numbers of the Presse and the Mousquetaire are disposed of by women than men. I never yet saw a newsboy in France. In the porters' lodges of the city, there are as many portresses as porters; and a landlord would prefer to take, for his service, a woman without a husband than a man without a wife. In small houses where one person only is required, that one person is a woman. Omnibus-conductors submit their way-bills, at the transfer offices, to women, for inspection and ratification. Women book you for a seat in the diligence. Women let donkeys for rides at Montmorenci, and saddle them too. Women undertake the moving of furniture, agree with you as to price, and you find them quite as responsible as men. Without multiplying instances, you will see what a number of avenues are open to females here, which in America are closed. At home, nearly all the situations obtainable by them are either menial, or involve subordination. Women are either servants, clerks, operatives, waiters, or type-setters. The foreman is rarely a woman, if I may be allowed the expression. Here, however, women hold positions of authority, responsibility and consideration, in the various employments of overseers and book-keepers, and even as heads of establishments. It has not been found that the weakness of the sex causes the empire to be any the less energetically asserted, or obedience to be less promptly rendered. There are other capacities in which women are employed in France, which I trust and believe would never be accepted by women at home; a brigade of street-sweepers contains an equal number of male and females. There are female chiffoniers and old clo' women. A complete establishment of a fruit or vegetable pedlar consist of a small cart, a man to shout and sell, and a woman and a dog harnessed into straps, to drag. In the country, women labour in the fields, and thrash and winnow in the barns. I might say that, from a motive of pity, I employ an old grandmother to weed an alley, tend a strawberry bed and hawthorn grove, in which I take an unnatural interest—considering that they grow on land not my own. American women were not born for such occupations as these; but I think there are many employments yet monopolized by men to which their labour might be usefully and conveniently diverted.—Paris Correspondent New York Times.

The Faroe Isles.

The climate of Faroe is much more genial and mild than would be supposed from its latitude, and far less severe in winter than many places in a southern latitude on the continent of Europe. The curlew and some other birds winter here, while they are not found on the continent, at this season, as far north as Hamburgh. The summer neither here nor in Iceland, is hot, though there are some warm days in July and August. While grain is never grown in Iceland, here they cultivate barley and oats, at a height of from two to six hundred feet above the level of the sea. Grass grows at an elevation of two thousand feet, but a little above that vegetation ceases and the land is a desert. Sometimes a violent wind occurs, that will roll up the grassy turf like a side of sole leather; and in this way the top of some hills get entirely denuded, the turf being carried out into the sea—trees do not grow here; these islands resembling, in that respect, Iceland, and the groups of Shetland add Orkney. Thunder here, as in Iceland, is heard in winter, but seldom in summer. There are a few lakes in the islands; Leinumvatu, in Stromoe, being one of the largest. It is in a sombre, melancholy-looking valley, and resembles some of the small lakes in the highlands of Scotland. As in all mountainous and peat districts, there are plenty of springs of fresh water.

The spoken language of the Faroese resembles that of the Icelanders, but the people have not the same literary taste and love of history. Their written language is the Danish. Originally settled from Norway by piratical cruisers, and about the time of the settlement of Iceland, the history of the islands has much in common with the more northern land. They paid tribute or were expected to, to the reigning chief of Norway; but the latter was very unfortunate in his collection of it. The deputy or collector sent out for this purpose seldom returned, and was rarely or never seen in Norway again. Some, attracted by the independent bearing of the people, took wives from among the fair Faroese, and settled permanently; thus paying a very direct and unmistakeable compliment to a brave and independent and republican people. Others declared themselves firm and incorruptible, and determined to execute their trust. Marriage is a most excellent institution; and all the Norwegian collectors who took brides from among the Faroe maidens found it no doubt, particularly to their advantage, and at the same time, in accordance with the good wishes and prosperity of the islanders themselves. Those who would not accept wives on such fair terms were never heard of again. Their bones were buried at low tide; the king of Norway kept sending his deputies to Faroe and they and their ships disappeared one after another, till finally none of his majesty's subjects would undertake the voyage. At last, Karl Maere, a celebrated pirate, offered his services; he left Norway, and arrived at Thorshaven in safety. He commenced collecting the tribute, and succeeded until he was himself compelled to pay a capitation tax. He was decapitated, and his companions returned without the money. Had the "wanderer" in Iceland been favored with the office of collector, he migh perhaps have visited Faroe; and in that case, he probably would not much longer have continued a wandering bachelor.

The Vice of Lying.

Lying, is a mean and cowardly quality, and altogether unbecoming a person of honor.—Aristotle lays it down for a maxim, that a brave man is clear in his discourse, and keeps close to the truth; and Plutarch calls lying the vice of a slave.

Lying in discourse is a disagreement between the speech and the mind of the speaker, when one thing is declared and another meant, and words are no image of thoughts. Hence it will follow, that he who mistakes a falsity for truth is no liar in reporting his judgment; and, on the other side, he that relates a matter which he believes to be false is guilty of lying, though he speaks the truth. A lie is to be measured by the conscience of him that speaks, and not by the truth of the proposition.

Lying is a breach of the articles of social commerce, and an invasion upon the fundamental rights of society.

Lying has a ruinous tendency; it strikes a damp upon business and pleasure, and dissolves the cement of society. Like gun powder, it is all noise and smoke; it darkens the air disturbs the sight, and blows up as far as it reaches.—Nobody can close with a liar; there is danger in the correspondence; and more than that we naturally hate those who make it their business to deceive us. Were lying universal, it would destroy the credit of books and records, make the past ages insignificant, and almost confine our knowledge to our five senses. We must travel by the compass or by the stars—forsaking the way would only misguide us.—Pearls of Great Price.

Chinese Currency—The Canton Mint and the Pillar Dollar.

Those who are best acquainted with the trade of the East, best know the singular preference which the Chinese people have always shown and continue to show for the old Carolus pillar dollar. In this passion, they have defied all principle of self-interest and of intrinsic value. In vain it has been shown that the modern Mexican dollar is to the full of equal value, that it contains as much pure silver, that so far as coinage goes, it is a more perfect manufacture—in spite of all, the Chinese have to this day persisted in receiving the Carolus pillar dollar at 10, 15, and even 20 per cent higher value than the Mexican dollar, and the same proportion, or even greater, than British silver or Indian rupees. At Shanghai, at one period last year, the Carolus dollar, the intrinsic value of which is $1,01, was worth $1,86.—This preference of the Chinese for this special coin, has led to its being collected from every other part of the world for that market. The countries in the Mediterranean where this coin formerly was the chief currency, have been almost entirely swept of it for the East. The difficulty therefore, which has attended the trade of China has been, that with a constantly increasing demand for this coin, the market of supply was rapidly becoming exhausted.

At length, however, the ingenuity of the Chinese seems to have discovered a solution to this growing and increasing difficulty. A mint has been established at Canton for coining Carolus pillar dollars of a date of 1778. And although, no doubt, in one respect it is a fraud to coin a foreign coin of the last century and of a king long since gathered to his fathers, yet in respect to real intrinsic quality there is no fraud. In every respect the Chinese Carolus pillar dollar is as much like the real dollar of Carolus the III, as those dollars are like each other. In intrinsic quality they are precisely the same. It is true the keen eye of the China Schroff is alive to the distinction, and we understand they only take them at ten per cent. discount upon the real ancient dollar.—The difference however, is likely soon to disappear, and it is probable that the mint will prove the solution of all the currency difficulties of the East, and will lead to different coins being accepted at their real intrinsic value in pure silver, in place of the arbitrary rates which they now command. If so, the Canton mint will exercise a powerful influence over the whole financial transactions of the East.—Buffalo Paper.

The Purchase of Cuba.

The tameness with which Northern presses and politicians receive the proposition to purchase Cuba, at a cost of from one to three hundred millions of dollars, at the moment when the South would not consent that the British Provinces should come into the Union without charge to the public treasury, is amazing! It is coolly proposed to buy an Island filled with savage negroes, and more savage Spanish masters, all speaking a different language, and all professing a different religion from our own, at a cost greater than that of the American Revolution; and the domineering slave interest, in the same breath, with unparalleled impudence and effrontery, declare external hostility to the peaceable annexation of a free, homogeneous people, although it should not cost the Federal Government a dollar. Are we a free Republic, or are we the bond slaves of the three hundred and seventy-five thousand lordly negro-drivers of the South?

Some Northern men, even Anti-Slavery men, have spoken of the acquisition of Cuba as desirable, on the ground that it will bring the Spanish system of slavery under the humanizing influences of our higher civilization.

This, in our judgment, is a great mistake. With the exception that a constant stream of barbarism has been pouring into Cuba, from the Coast of Africa, which has kept down the standard of negro civilization, we regard the laws of that Island as far more favorable to the slave than those of our Southern States.

In Cuba, every slave has the privilege of emancipating himself, by paying a price which does not depend upon the selfish exactions of the masters; but it is either a fixed price, or else is fixed in each case by disinterested appraisers. The consequence is, that emancipations are constantly going on, and the free people of color are becoming enlightened, cultivated and wealthy. In no part of the United States do they occupy the high social position which they enjoy in Cuba.

Is it not certain, that in the event of annexation, these humane, legal, and social regulations will be overturned, and that the intolerant spirit which pervades Mississippi and Georgia will be substituted.

But another invincible objection, with every honorable and humane man, must be the impulse which will be given to the slave trade between our shores and those of Cuba. No man can pretend that a traffic in Christian negroes and mulatoes is a whit better than that which is carried on from the Coast of Africa to Cuba, in ignorant savages. Indeed, provided the latter were legalized, and the natives were not encouraged to go to war to make slaves, we are clearly of opinion, that it is less criminal than the infamous domestic trade. The latter, equally with the former, disregards all the most sacred and endearing ties of family, of parent and child, and of husband and wife. None but the vilest demagogues in politics, or hypocrites in religion, will deny a fact so notorious: and unless the Christian people of the United States are willing to see a three-fold augmentation of this infernal traffic, they should never listen to the proposition of annexing Cuba, while slavery continues there and here in its present form.

Demagogues will pretend that the annexation of Cuba will stop the African slave trade; and in this way they hope to satisfy the consciences of Northern men. But do we not see the champions of slavery demanding the revival of the African slave trade even for this Continent? And, although some of them scruple a little on this point, because they fear that its odium may injure more practicable and pressing schemes, will they not, after acquiring Cuba, demand the continuance of the African slave trade, which already exists, as indispensable? They are endeavoring to acquire the Amazon Valley, for the purpose of carrying slavery to it; and with such a demand for slaves as will follow, it is the height of credulity to believe that the conscience of the ruling class in the South will higgle at the idea of reviving all the horrors of the slave trade, against which all the good men of this country and of England have contended for seventy years, and which is now nearly destroyed.—National Era.

The Slave Decrees at Havana.

We published on Monday a despatch from Charleston, S. C., announcing the approval by the Spanish Goverment of the Captain General's course in the Black Warrior affair, and likewise stating that the Captain General had issued new regulations concerning the negroes. The New York, Charleston and New Orleans papers have since contained correspondence in relation to the matter, setting forth the contemplated and actual changes at length. We are compelled, in consequence of our limited space, to content ourselves with a brief abstract.

The preamble to the decree denies the existence of a compact with Great Britain by which Spain is bound to emancipate the slaves of Cuba. It declares that it is time to make the life of the Creole bondman more sweet than that of the white labourer of Europe, and proclaims that the slave trade must and shall be stopped. The decree then orders, "without prejudice to other higher measures, the approbation of which I wait from her Majesty,"—that the following regulations shall be of force after the first of August next. 1. That within one month from the landing of negroes the authorities shall have power to search suspected estates for them, and muster and examine the negroes as they think proper. 2. The local authorities shall each year form lists of the negroes,—the masters to give notice of any reduction or increase, giving the birth, and name of the person from whom they come. 3. All negroes found and not registered to be seized and declared free; if newly imported, the holders to be subject to the fines imposed on abbettors of the traffic; if not newly imported, they be fined fifty dollars for every negro not registered. 4. Civil authorities failing to give information of landings are to be deprived of their offices. 5. Captains of Partidos failing to capture negroes landed in their jurisdiction shall lose their offices. 6. Persons, great or small, occupied in the traffic in slaves, to be expelled from the Island for two years.—Phil. Register.

"DELTA," who is travelling through the Southern Atlantic States on business, writes to The Whig Press, Middleton, N. Y., from Charlotte, N. C., May 17th, as follows:

"While at Winnsborough, N. C., about two o'clock on Sunday morning, I was awakened by the cry of suffering, and soon learned the cause. Immediately underneath my window, a negro was receiving the lashes of his master. He was stripped entirely naked, and his master was flogging him with a harness trace. The night watch had found him asleep in a back yard of the hotel, and therefore concluded he was there intending to commit burglary; his master was called and the whipping commenced to make him confess. At no time during the inquisition was ever more cruelty displayed; his feet were fastened to the ground, and his body stretched over an outside market stall, and the lash fell with an unsparing hand. His back was literally pounded to a jelly, and at every stroke the blood oozed out and trickled to the ground, and his simple tale was, "Massa, I wasn't going to do anything." For one hour and a half this cruel treatment was continued, till the victim begged that they would take a gun and kill him, and fainted from pure exhaustion; then it was discontinued, and in the morning I heard them say he received 277 lashes. There were some scenes connected with this punishment too revolting to write, much more to be believed;—therefore, I refrain from writing more upon the subject. Sufficeit to say, it reminded me forcibly of one of the scenes in Uncle Tom's Cabin, with Legree for principal actor."

From the National Era.

What Becomes of the Free Colored People?

It cannot be denied that the ratio of their increase has fallen far below that of the whites or the slaves. In the earlier years of the Republic it was greater than that of any other class, in consequence of emancipations; gradually the supply from that source was stopped, and their increase was about equal to that of the whites. At length it fell below, not only the whites, but the slaves; and now it is little more than one-third the ratio of the other classes, with a downward tendency.

It has been argued, from this state of things, that Slavery is the only condition in which the negro thrives, and that to liberate him is to annihilate him. This is the philosophy of the friends of Slavery, and the example of the Detroit Free Press shows that the Northern men are in some instances disposed to give it countenance. We dissent entirely from this gloomy philosophy, and proceed to set forth reasons for believing that it has no foundation to rest on, but the unjust prejudices which have been engendered in the atmosphere of Slavery. We also propose to answer the question with which our article is headed, by pointing out the whereabouts of the missing free colored people.

In the first place, if it were true that the tyranny of law and custom in this country has tended to impoverish and depress the free colored people, the fact is by no means attributable to the race, but to the tyranny. They are not only proscribed by law, North and South, but the weight of prejudice against them more imperiously than law has assigned them an inferior station, and denied them the privilege of pursuing the most honorable occupations. In the slave States, the slaveholders look upon them with suspicion, and nothing but necessity could induce them to give employment to the despised race. We understand that within a few years the demand for labor has been so great in some sections as to overcome prejudice, and there has been a consequent improvement in the condition of the free colored population. In the free States, strong prejudice exists among the white laboring class against the colored people, and they are often denied employment on this account. These depressing circumstances doubtless have operated injuriously upon them, and prevented as rapid increase as would otherwise have taken place. But they are insufficient to account for the great falling off in the ratio of increase, and in some of the States the actual diminution of their numbers. This decrease is most conspicuous in the opposite extremes of the Union. New England and New York show a gradual falling off. The middle western, and southern States, except Louisiana, exhibit more or less gain. The latter, however, shows the remarkable and sudden falling off, in the last ten years, of thirty-one per cent! Up to 1840, the free colored population of Louisiana had grown rapidly, showing a decennial increase of from thirty-eight to sixty per cent. The sudden declension is the more remarkable from the fact that Louisiana is the only Southern State whose laws affecting this class of the population are tinctured with the least grain of humanity. In Louisiana, free colored persons are allowed to testify in their courts of justice; and the municipal authorities of New Orleans, where they reside for the most part, makes a provision for the education of their children. Is it not most singular that under such circumstances they show a declension amounting to nearly one-third of their numbers, while in Virginia, in spite of the most rigorous and inhuman laws, they have increased eight per cent?

In New England and New York, also, the people of color are regarded with more favor than anywhere else in the Union, and yet they have actually declined in numbers in ten years. In Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, and other free States, on the other hand, where they meet with less favor, their numbers are on the increase.

Those who maintain that Slavery is the only proper condition of the negro, and who insist that freedom is destructive of his existence, may argue, from the state of facts to which we have called attention, that the cruel persecution and proscription to which the free people of color are subject in the middle and southern States, are the cause of their increase, while the humanity with which they are regarded in New England and Louisiana is fatal to their existence!

But we will undertake to assign a more rational and probable cause for this anomalous state of things, and which will explain the reason of the apparent diminution of the free colored population.

In all the slaveholding States, and in several of the free, the elective franchise, and other privileges of citizenship, are confined to free white men. But this question naturally arises in a mixed free population, composed of whites and mulattoes of all shades, viz: Who are white? Superficial thinkers, inexperienced in the practical workings of the black codes, may imagine that no such question could ever arise; but Southern legislators and judges are better informed on this point, as we will proceed to show. We have not had time to make a thorough examination of the Statutes and Reports of all the slave States in reference to this point, but we cannot doubt that in each there must exist a legal definition, either legislative or judicial, upon the terms white and mulatto. Cases must needs occasionally present themselves, which give rise to a doubt about the class to which an individual belongs, and hence the necessity for a legal definition. But, in the limited examination which we have been able to give the subject, we have only found such legal definitions in four of the slave States. They are as follows:

"Every person, other than a negro, of whose grandfathers or grandmothers any one is or shall have been a negro, although all his other progenitors, except that descending from the negro, shall have been white persons, shall be deemed a mulatto; and so, every such person who shall have one-fourth part or more of negro blood shall in like manner be deemed a mulatto." Tate's (Virgiana) Digest, p. 843.

"All negroes, mulattoes, Indians, and all persons of mixed blood, descended from negro or Indian ancestors, to the third generation inclusive, though one ancestor of each generation may have been a white person, whether bond or free, shall be taken and deemed to be incapable in law to be witnesses in any case whatsoever, except for and against each other."—Clay's (Alabama) Digest, p. 600.

"All free mulattoes, descended from negro ancestors to the fourth generation inclusive, though one ancester of each generation may have been a white person, shall come within the provisions of this act."—Rev. Statutes of North Carolina, Vol. 1, p. 589.

"Every person, other than a negro, of whose grandfathers or grandmothers any one is or shall have been a negro, although all his other progenitors, except that descending from the negro, shall have been white persons, shall be deemed a mulatto; and so, every such person who shall have one-fourth part or more of negro blood, shall in like manner be deemed a mulatto."—Statutes of Mississippi, p. 157.

In the case of Virginia, if we mistake not, the definition of a mulatto has been made on the authority of legal decisions. In the other case, the Legislature has settled the question. We may assume, on these premises, that the general and common law of the South defines a man of color to be one who has one-fourth or more African blood in him; and that a man with less than one-fourth of African blood is to be reckoned a white man, and invested with all the rights and privileges of the Anglo-Saxon race.

Where two races of men are thrown together in greatly different proportions, it must necessarily follow that a commingling will seem to destroy the lesser, when in fact it is only absorbed. The compound race will exhibit the characteristics of predominant element, while the less numerous race will seem to disappear. It is on this principle that the Anglo-Saxon race has aborbed, first the Danes and then the Normans, notwithstanding that the latter were successively conquerors of the former. Moorish blood is largely infused into the veins of the Spaniards and Portuguese, traces of which are still observable, but not in a sufficient degree to destroy the predominant Caucasian element. The Jews have in all ages been a peculiar people, bound together by a feeling of nationality, of religious conviction, and spiritual pride and intolerance, which has never had a parallel in the history of mankind. They have always been as remarkable for thrift and the love of money, as for the tenacity with which they have held to their religion. They have undergone great persecutions in former ages, and hundreds of thousands of them have been swept from the earth by the hand of tyranny. Still, their persecutions will not account for the fact that they have not multiplied in any degree commensurate with the ordinary natural increase of mankind. If they had so much as doubled once in a century, from the time of their dispersion to the present day, they would now far out-number the whole population of the world; or if they had increased during the last two centuries in the ordinary ratio of the increase of the species, they would exceed the population of the United States,—perhaps twice told. But, notwithstanding their intelligence, industry, and thrift, they are now less numerous than they were two thousand years ago. What is the necessary inference from these well-known facts? Is it not evident that, in spite of their pride of race and religion, they have for the most part been absorbed or amalgamated with the people among whom they have sojourned?

We have called attention to these historical facts, to show that where races of men are mingled in different proportions, the less numerous will seem wholly to disappear, and the compound will of necessity carry the predominant characteristics of the more numerous race. The admixture of the whites and blacks in this country forms no exception to the rule. The first result of commingling European and African blood shows clearly-defined traces of the latter. The second, in which the white and half-breed come together, leaves fainter traces of the African; while in the third, when the whole blood of white is mixed with the mulatto, having only one-fourth African in it, the issue will scarcely be distinguishable from that of white persons, and will have but one-eighth of African blood. Such persons, when free, have only to change their residence and name, to be recognised as white; and we have shown, above, that the laws of the slaveholding States regard them as such. In the free States, where no legal necessity exists for defining the difference between white and colored, there is still less impediment to the ascent of the inferior race in the social scale.

Every Southern man's experience will furnish him with examples in illustration of the principles here laid down.

We have called attention to the fact, that in New England, New York, and Louisiana, where the free colored people find most favor, they are on the decline; while in other sections less humane and just to them, they are multiplying. It is clear to us that these facts are dependent upon each other. Where there is a spirit of kindness and humanity to the people of color, and yet with a superincumbent weight of prejudice resting upon them, there will be a disposition to release individuals from the weight of it. Social ties often become stronger than the prejudice of race, and respectable men, with scarcely a trace of the African in them, will cease to be regarded as such.

It is to be observed, also, that the takers of the census would naturally omit, from kindness, or favor, or inadvertence, to place many men on the colored list, particularly in the more Northern States; and in this way thousands are withdrawn from the proscribed class.

We have already extended this article to unwonted limits, and feel admonished of the propriety of bringing it to a close. We have, nevertheless, other observations, which we are prompted to add, but which we must dispense with for the present.

Facts of Slavery.

POLITICAL POWER OF THE SLAVEHOLDERS.—The following table, prepared by the editor of The Philadelphia Register, gives in brief space some idea of the preponderance of political power which has been exercised by the slaveholders since this Government went into operation. It must be borne in mind that these 291 offices have not only been given to the southern States, which are and always have been greatly inferior in population to the free States; but they have been given in nearly every instance to a class of the people of the South, the slaveholders themselves. No other class of southern people stands much chance for power or influence. Three hundred thousand men, more or less, have ever since the first President was chosen, but more particularly within the last thirty or forty years, controlled absolutely the Government. The offices which they have not themselves filled, they have given the meanest men that could be found in the northern States. Look particularly at the office of President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, which are of very great consequence in controlling the legislation of Congress. Here are the "figures:"

Anti-Slavery Meeting in Jamaica.

At a public meeting of the inhabitants of St. Mary's, Jamaica, held in the Court House, Port Maria, the following resolutions were passed, unanimously:—

"Resolved, That this meeting, composed of loyal subjects, of every class and color, and without distinction of creed, rejoices in the fact that England has taken the lead among the nations of the earth, in exerting her philanthropy and power for the destruction of the monstrous wrongs of slavery and the slave trade in her own dominions.

That, having gained for herself so much glory in the progress she has already made in raising thousands of the descendants of Africa to the rights of humanity, England cannot, consistently or rightly, relax her praiseworthy efforts to extend the same blessing to bondmen in every part of the world, and especially to those illegally deprived of their freedom in certain countries which stand in close commercial relations with Great Britain.'

Sneaking vice, wrapped in the labelled cloak of Piety, finds "open sesame;" shrinking Conscientiousness, jostled rudely aside, weeps in secret its fancied unworthiness.

Colored Emigration Convention.

[Special Dispatch to the N. Y. Tribune.]

CLEVELAND, OHIO,
Thursday, Aug. 24, 1854,—8, p.m

The Colored Emigration Convention closed its labours to-night, after a session of three days. About one hundred delegates from the States and Canada were present. The Rev. W. C. Monroe of Michigan, acted as President. The Convention adopted a platform favourable to the segregation of the colored race, to establish a Board of Commissioners, and reported a plan for issuing a quarterly periodical, to be called The Colored American Quarterly.

ANTHONY BURNS.—The case of Anthony Burns is not yet fully decided, as far as his personal freedom is concerned. Negotiations for his purchase have been going on for several weeks, and when the matter is definitely settled, a new and interesting chapter will be added to the annals of the "peculiar institution" From what we learn, we judge that several of the officers who were quite active in his rendition, are now equally earnest that he should become free. His recent correspondence with them is said to be calculated to make them more than ever desirous that he should be redeemed.—Transcript.

ALL MEN FREE AND EQUAL.—On the Fourth of July it is customary to read publicly the Declaration of Independence, which declares that all men are born free and equal. On the late Fourth of July a practical illustration of this maxim was given at the House in Stewart county, Georgia, in conformity with the following announcement. Is this Mr. Toombs, the United States Senator of that name?

ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.—Will be sold on the first Tuesday in July next, at the Court-house door of Stewart county, between ninety and one hundred NEGROES, consisting of men, women, boys, &c. These negroes are all very likely, and between forty and fifty of the number are men and boys. Sold as the property of Henry J. Pope, deceased, in pursuance of an order of the Court of Ordinary of Stewart county, for the benefit of heirs and creditors Terms of sale—a credit (with interest) until 25th December next.

Republicanism in Buenos Ayres.

The Constitution recently formed in Buenos Ayres, resembles in many respects our republicanism system, and in some respects, surpasses ours. Personal rights are better protected than in the U. States, as will be seen by the following extracts from the "general Declarations" in her constitution.

All the inhabitants of the State have a right to be protected in the enjoyment of their lives, reputation, liberty, security and property. No one shall be deprived of them except in conformity with the laws.

All the inhabitants of the State are equal before the law, and this whether penal, perceptive, permissive, or defensive, must be one and the same for all.

All may publish, by the Press, their ideas and opinions, in subjection to the specific law.

The right of pacific meeting, and of individual or collective retition to all the authorities, are secured to all the inhabitants of the State. The form of these shall be regulated by a specific law.

Prospects of a Bonaparte Pope.

Louis Napoleon's cousin, Prince Lucian Bonaparte, second son of the Prince de Canino, has taken orders, and donned priestly vestments. On this subject the Glasgow Commonwealth remarks:—"The present Pope is in a very bad state of health. He is becoming very dropsical, and is already frequently unfit for such portions of his pontifical duties as involve much physicial fatigue. No wonder, then, that in the present extraordinary state of Europe, when so much depends on the man who may chance to occupy the papal chair, various parties are looking forward anxiously to the time when the decease of the present Pope will occasion a new election. Among these parties Louis Napoleon is naturally one of the most interested. His position in Europe, and at all events, his designs on Italy, will be materially affected by the situation of the papacy during the coming year. * * * * As this line of Bonapartes (Canino) have the double qualification of being Bonapartes and naturalized Italians, it is probable from it that a Bonaparte candidate for the papacy would be most easily procured. The Prince of Canino is, we should suppose, too old himself to enter on the ecclesiastical career—but one of his sons would be of about the proper age to answer all required purposes. This we offer but as a guess—the rumor, as we have heard it, simply being that Louis Napoleon is about to start one of his relatives on a course of ecclesiastical promotion, which, if the fortunes of the family last, might lead in the end to the papacy. Whether he could get him cardinalized in time for the next election would depend on circumstances, but even the election after that might not be too late. Looking at the present position of the Bonaparte family, the prospect of a Bonaparte Pope any time within the next thirty years is something in which Europe might well, even now, feel an interest—and even should the present rumor not be authentic, the possibility which it points to is curious enough to deserve consideration."—*N. The Escape of the Czar.

"A man gets up in the morning on his own premises, but little knows where he may sleep at night." The Czar of all the Russias has lately been within an ace of offering in his own person a practical confirmation of this well-known saying. What would the British public have thought—what would the King of Prussia in his cups have thought—what would Omar Pacha in his fez cap have thought—what would the allied troops have thought—and finally, what would the Three per Cents have thought, if, about this time, the Czar of all the Russias, the Archduke Constantine, and the Archduchess, and the Russian Admiral in command of Cronstadt, had been sent home by Sir Charles Napier in the small steamer which had captured them! Improbable as the tale may appear—impossible the catastrophe—it was fairly upon the cards the last few weeks. The facts are these:—A short while back, while the allied fleets were lying before Cronstadt, an English yacht belonging to Lords Lichfield and Euston, with Lord Clarence Paget on board, ventured somewhat too near the guns of the place. Suddenly a puff of steam was seen on the Russian side, and a small Russian steamer put out to sea, with the evident intention of cutting off the English yacht. On board of that steamer were the Czar Nicholas, his son the Archduke Constantine, the Archduchess his wife, and the Russian Admiral, who all went forth to enjoy the satisfaction of an easy triumph over the poor little yacht. She is, in point of fact, stated to have been in the most imminent danger of capture. The Czar, however, was destined to be foiled in his anticipated little triumph, as he has already been foiled in his hopes of many a great one. An English war-steamer, seeing the danger to which the yacht was exposed, advanced with all speed to her relief. Shortly she obtained such a position that the English yacht was safe; and the only question that remained for discussion was one between the two small war steamers—the one under English the other under Russian colors. Could the English but have known the valuable freight which that little steamer contained—could the captain but have known that by capturing her, or sending her to the bottom, peace would have been restored to Europe, and probably a million of human lives, first and last, been saved, we have no doubt that he would have carried one or the other of the alternatives into effect, even though his own destruction, that of his ship, and of every soul on board of her had been the inevitable consequence. As it was, he saw nothing before him but a little trumpery steamer—he had carried his purpose of relieving the English yacht into effect—and remembered orders which certainly had been issued, to the effect that no English ship, upon the mere heroic impulse of her commander, should be thrust into the lion's mouth. We have no doubt that this was, and that when the English captain gave his orders for putting the head of his steamer round, he did so with the feeling that he had very satisfactorily discharged the duty to which he had been entrusted. Little did he suppose at the moment, that he had lost probably the greatest opportunity for obtaining personal distinction which had ever been thrown in the way of a single man. The English nation venerates the name of Lord Nelson for the sake of certain little affairs in which he was engaged off Cape St. Vincent, at the Nile, at Copenhagen, at Trafalgar and elsewhere, but not all these wonderful, important, and heroic achievements combined, would have had such an important influence on the history of the world as the capture of that little Russian steamer. It was given to the captain of a small steamer to change the face of all Europe in ten minutes, well employed, but in pure innocence he missed the chance.

Awakeners and the Awakened.

The Son of Temperance, a paper devoted, it says, to the Temperance question; but so far as its readers can discover, to politics, &c., has had a sudden awakening on the colored question. The zeal of young converts is often more intense, though seldom so lasting, than the rational proceedings of men of more experience, and who have been moved by the intrinsic merits of the cause; we fear this is the case with the Son. The Planet—Larwill's organ, the Kent Advertiser, and it, are harmoniously tuning their harps to a strain introduced by Mr. Douglass, in his Chatham speech. When commendation of anti-slavery speeches comes from such quarters, we know what to expect. Mr. Douglass alludes to the "laziness and impudence of some negroes in Canada"—says the Son—the Planet has thought of the same. The Son did the same a few weeks ago. Douglass told them what they should all do, in such a manner as to insult the self-respect of the colored people; but no matter, the Son and Planet are in extacies; all the negroes should walk straight. Do all the whites—have they not their proportion of impudent; or in the language of Mr. Douglass, "insolent" people among them? Yes, but you blacks should all remember to be well behaved; especially as you have privileges, &c. So should all the Irish, English, Dutch, Canadians, &c., that go to the United States for privileges; but do they? We deplore improper conduct on the part of colored people, as much as you do, Messrs. Son, Planet, Douglass, and the rest of you; but we are not blind to the fact that your remarks individually, and jointly, from the disjointed editorials of the Son, to the great speech in question, are alike gratuitous, and insulting to the colored people of Canada. Your professions of interest will go for naught, unless couched in terms bearing less the impress of the arrogant dictator. Why what is "this Canada" coming to?

Colored Hotel.—Mrs. Stowe with Colonizationists, &c.

☞ The New York correspondent of the Philadelphia City Item, says:—"I have a news item for you! Wm. B. Astor, Josiah Perham, Horace Greeley, P. T. Barnum, William H. Burroughs, of the Irving, and Coleman and Stetson of the Astor House, have purchased the row of brick buildings facing the Bowling Green, and looking up Broadway. They will demolish these buildings and erect upon the site a fine hotel, of brown stone. Now for the gist of the matter. This hotel is intended solely for the colored people of the United States. It will be leased to colored men, and none but colored men and women will be allowed to board there. An establishment of this kind has long been wanted in this city."—Liberator.

We find the above going the rounds of the anti-slavery press, without remark. We see also, another choice morceau circulating, which is in like manner honorably exempt from comment. Mrs. Stowe is to receive articles from the abolition ladies of France, to establish a Bazaar, the proceeds of which will be used to settle Emancipated Slaves in Liberia

The men who declaim, on First of August occasions, on the beauties of British freedom, are about to establish a negro pew hotel—a house solely for the colored people. While colored people have inferior boarding houses leased without conditions, whites may by accident or design become acquainted with them,—they (the colored people) may possibly urge their equal claims to other hotels, but at once make a fine palace solely for them, and Mr. Greeley and the rest of the friends will not be annoyed by their clamors for justice.

This is the sugar-plum principle for an abused child, certainly. Black schools,—Black hotels,—Black grave-yards, are all approvingly permitted and endowed by Greeley and the preservers of the colored race; and what anti-slavery papers of note, in the United States, can be found to sound the alarm? A few years ago, and their columns would have been in a light blaze. Henry Clay, and other dead and living embodiments of pro-slavery, did not talk in vain, when they prophesied the final triumph of their nefarious purposes, against the colored man. Who so ready to do their work now as the men and women who make the welkin ring, at other times, with professions of love of equality (?) without regard to races? Are Mrs Stowe's colonization movements to go on without rebuke from "the sentinels on the watch-tower?" If so, the colored people should be true to their humanity, at least, and protest before God against such false philanthropy. Why not settle Emancipated slaves in Canada, Mrs. Stowe? Why make the experiment of having them "try" their freedom so far away from the land of their birth? Is not America dear to you? Where are the Liberator and other old journals? But we fear, with Mr. Burchel, that their great interest is all "fudge."

Starving Fugitive Slaves.

"A colored man in Canada, named Rice, publishes an appeal to American Abolitionists, for assistance for the numerous fugitive slaves in that portion of her Majesty's dominions. They are said to be in a starving and deplorable condition."

We find the foregoing set forth in several newspapers, as a striking instance of the thriftlessness of the negro in a state of freedom. We think it ought not to be deemed surprising that men and women who have toiled for others all their lives should find themselves destitute on emerging from their condition of thraldom. They should certainly be aided and sustained for a time at least; and not until their offspring, under the most favorable circumstances for the development of their powers, fail to provide for their own wants, should their destitute condition be pointed out as proof of incapacity. —National Era.

The man Rice, alluded to, is not colored, neither are the fugitives in or near Amherstburg in a "starving and deplorable condition," so the well meant vindication of them in their supposed necessitous condition by the Era is unnecessary. Rice is a white man and one who has neither the confidence of the fugitives nor of the whites to any extent—his notorious lying and begging operations have been frequently protested against by fugitives and colored people generally in this country; but like much else against our people here, they cannot get a hearing, because those who could set the matter right have plans of their own against, though in the name of the fugitives to carry out. 5,000 circulars were issued a year or two since by this same Rice, setting forth the great destitution of the colored people; but not realizing his expectations, by reason of measures taken to defeat them, he is doing the same again. Colchester, Amherstburg, and the country around the theatre of his operations, have an industrious self-supporting colored population. Labor is abundant, and they get pay; besides many are land-owners. Such a startling account of their condition will be received with indignation by the people.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman.

DEAR MADAM,—It is amusing to observe, from time to time, some of our timid colored friends (or rather would be, if the wind would seem to them to blow in favor of the enterprises you have in hand,) getting into a panic and raising a hue-and-cry about the course the Conductors and Proprietors of your Journal feel it their duty to pursue, with regard to certain parties, and their movements, both on this and the other side of the lake. Why, Madam, are you not in a country which allows you the freedom of speech? "But oh!" say those sensitive ones, "you must not say anything against the doings of any of the anti-Slavery people," no matter what those doings may be, or however injurious to the interests you support. "They are our friends," say they, and "we cannot afford to lose them." Now, I am ready to admit, that it is always desirable to retain true frends, but those who profess to be, and, at the same time show by their works that they are not, do not merit a consideration as such, much less that you should pay them homage, in accordance with the wish of those among us, who, like themselves, are doing the Freeman all the harm they can, But, from what I know of the sentiments of our people generally, in regard to your course, I have good reasons to believe that their labours are in vain. They affect to be very indignant, because you have made use of your British right to speak of the movements of Mr. Douglass and others, in a way worthy of the confidence of those whose cause you advocate, and of those who feel an interest in its success. But why, I ask, should not their doings be examined? We, in this country, canvass the acts of our public men, from the lowest to the highest in office; and are we to be told that the obnoxious course pursued by Mr. Douglass in matters in which we are deeply interested, must not only not be resisted, but must not be spoken of but in terms of approbation? I am proud to behold the independent manner in which you conduct the Freeman. You have a duty to perform to the colored people in particular, and to humanity in general; and they do not like the commendable way in which your are doing it, because it conflicts with some of their designs.

Yours, respectfully,
JAMES WENTWORTH, Jun.

Hamilton, C. W., Aug. 29, 1854.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman:

DEAR MADAM,—I wish to correct, as far as possible, false impressions which may have been made respecting the prevalence of prejudice towards colored people in St. Catharines. A short time since, the proceedings of a meeting of colored people, expressive of indignation against developments of prejudice about certain hotels here, were published in the Freeman; the same appeared in the semi-weekly Post of St. Catharines; also a statement of facts by "A Citizen." The latter was copied more recently into the New York Spectator, headed "Prejudice in Canada." The facts in the case were correctly quoted in the Spectator, but with an important omission, which was unfair. The Citizen, whom I well know, states that those cases of indignity and insult to colored people BY NO MEANS INDICATED BRITISH FEELING, nor did they indicate enlightened American feeling—that the like was seldom known anywhere on the American continent, and that if the people of St. Catharines could tolerate such outrages, they were entitled to have a missionary of civilization sent them. This part being omitted by the Spectator, the impression would naturally be made that we are an ill-bred people, and that barbarism is here in the ascendant, and that prejudice is even worse in Canada than in the United States. Now, to put the matter in the right light, let me say that prejudice, dwelling as it does, in dark and little minds, is here the exception, not the rule. Prejudice is an intruder on earth, having come up from hell, by WAY OF THE UNITED STATES. It is not indigineous to the soil, nor of native Canadian growth.—Happily the evil complained of has been remedied at the St. Catharines House, which is the leading hotel of the place, and the keeper of "the American" will have to follow suit or run down.

Unfortunately these inn-keepers were not well posted up, in regard to the progress of Anti-Slavery, and the wonderful change that has taken place in the treatment of colored people on both sides of the national line. No reasonable white man would object to their riding in public conveyances. The few who do object are usually of low and mean standing, and are more likely to be rogues, if fairly tested, than honest or honorable men. Our beautiful village has, of late, been cursed by the presence of some of this class, who have broken into stores at midnight to plunder. Some of them are likely to find a home for a while in the Penitentiary at Kingston. If rascality was all banished from the land, there would be no such thing as complexional prejudice to annoy the colored people or those who befriend them.

Those who are the subjects of a hurtful and hateful prejudice, are the chaff, and not the wheat; the rubbish, not the substance of humanity. Such should be pitied, not courted; the compassion of God is extended to them, and why not ours? For one, I sincerely pity them. Should God give them their desires, and at their death, exempt them from the consequences of prejudice, they must be candidates for annihilation; for if they ascend up into heaven, they will find Africans there, such as Cyprian, Origin, Tertullian, and St. Augustine; if they go down to hell, they will find Africans there. Pray where will they go? To show that colourphobia is a hell born concomitant of slavery, and nothing else, I wish to state a fact or two to the point:

There lived in Toronto, for many years, a good old man—a shoemaker—by name of Matthew B. Truss—many of your Toronto readers know him well—he came from Staunton, Va., was much annoyed there by prejudice. The Presbyterians in Staunton built a large house of worship. They were slaveholders, of course, or supporters of slavery. They constructed it so as to exclude the colored people entirely from the white congregation, and box them up in a dark gallery, to which they had access from the outside; a "stern plank wall was to hide them from the view of the minister and people. This was explained to Mr. Truss, by the head workman, while the building was in progress. Having subscribed towards the house, he went home, cleverly fired up with indignation—mused over the matter, and soon produced the following lines:—

My brother, and I, and several more,
Did labor hard you know,
To build a place, which I disgrace,
If I my face do show.

Last Sabbath day, I went to church,
Myself to satisfy;
I heard a voice, but saw no man,
And a good reason why.

Early and late, they did debate,
For to divise a plan;
To take me there, the truth to hear,
Which God revealed to man.

My face to see, they'd not agree,
In a place so nice and clean;
In God's whole book, they all may look,
The like was never seen.

On right and left, and just before,
There was a stern plank wall,
That hid my face from his good grace,
Who essayed to preach to all

I won't go there, the truth to hear,
And like a mole sit blind,
Since I've been told, by some so bold,
Christ died for all mankind.

Adieu! adieu! I say adieu!
I bid you a long farewell;
I'll go to the net that Wesley set,
Where none are doomed to hell.

It takes in all, both great and small,
To hear and see are free;
That is the place, of God's True Grace,
The only rest for me.

The old man's poetry soon became current among the young people—greatly amused them, and had the effect of striking down the "stern plank wall" in front, so that the sable worshippers, by stretching their necks, could see over.

Yours truly,
H. Wilson.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman:

Dear Madam,—I know of no way at the present, whereby I can do more to interest yourself, and, I trust, your readers, than by calling your attention to a book of poems which is about to be issued from the pen of the gifted Miss Frances E. Watkins, late of Baltimore, but now of this State.

In order that you may have some idea of the ability of the young authoress, as well as the quality and nature of her productions, I now take this occasion to forward you a piece of her prose, and also a piece of her poetry, hoping that you will give them a place in the columns of your paper, as specimens of her style, &c. In making this demand upon your liberality, I feel quite sure that every unbiased and liberal-minded reader of your paper, who may carefully peruse the articles referred to, will accord to the authoress high intellectual culture, and much merit in the adaptation of her thoughts and faculties to subjects of vital importance; especially will the reader feel proud of the gems of the authoress, when he shall have taken into account the fact that she is herself of the down-trodden class—in complexion and proscription—and for the obtainment of their rights she is devoting her time and improving her talents.

The various subjects of which the book will be composed will treat on Christianity, Anti-Slavery, Temperance, and other kindred reforms; and most admirably, I think, has she proved herself capable of judging of what kind of material is best suited to reach the heart.

It may not be amiss to state, here, that Miss W. has been constantly engaged as School Teacher and Seamstress during the time of writing the book, and consequently has only had the privilege for study of such leisure hours as fall to the lot of those in her calling. But according to the judgment of several able critics who have examined the manuscript, I think I may take the liberty to predict that it will rank as high, if not higher, than any production of the kind ever published in this country by a colored person. It will not be large, but what there will be of it will be all heart: and it is to be hoped that sufficient encouragement will be shown to the writer, to induce her to make still further progress in the cultivation of her own mind, whereby she will be enabled to accomplish great good in the advocacy of the rights of her fellow creatures.

But I have said enough, and will now introduce Miss W.'s articles, as referred to.

Yours truly,
W. S.

Philadelphia, July, 1854.

Christianity.

by miss frances ellen watkins.

Christianity is a system claiming God for its author, and the welfare of man for its object. It is a system so unform, exalted and pure, that the loftiest intellects have acknowledged its influence, and acquiesced in the justness of its claims. Genius has bent from its erratic course to gather fire from her altars, and pathos from the agony of Gethsemane, and the sufferings of Calvary. Learning has brought her richest pearls, and rarest gems to lay at her feet, while she bent from her lofty heights to bow at the lowly cross. Poetry has culled her fairest flowers, and wreathed her softest leaves to bind her Author's "bleeding brow." Philosophy and science have paused amid their speculative researches and wondrous revelations, to gain knowledge from her teachings, and wisdom from her precepts. Christianity has changed the moral aspect of countries. Idolatrous temples have crumbled at her touch, and guilt owned its deformity at her presence.

At her presence fetters have been broken and men have risen, redeemed from dust and freed from chains. She has nerved up woman's frail and sinking heart for high and holy deeds. She has cheered the prisoner in his cell, and strengthened the martyr at the stake. She has stood by the bed of the dying, and unveiled the glories of eternal life, while she gilded the darkness of the tomb with the glory of the resurrection. Envy has been rebuked by her contented look, and fretful impatience by her gentle and resigned manner. She has bent over the form of lovely childhood, and suffered it to have a place in the Redeemer's arms. She has been the staff of decrepit age, and the joy of manhood in its strength. The worn and weary have rested their fainting heads upon her bosom, and gathered strength from her words, and courage from her counsels. To man, guilty, fallen and degraded man, she shows a "fountain drawn from Emanuel's veins," there she bids him wash and be clean. She points him to "Mount Zion, to the city of the living God, to an innumerable company of angels, to the spirits of just men made perfect, and to Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," and bids us rise from the degradation of sin, renew our nature and join with them. She draws a pattern so excellent and pure, that we might shrink from it discouraged did she not bring with her a promise from the lips of Jehovah that He would give power to the faint and might to those who have no strength."

History may bring her pondrous records, Philosophy her abstruse speculations; literature her elegance with the toils of the pen, and the labours of the pencil, but they are idle tales compared to the truths of Christianity. They may enlighten the understanding, cultivate the intellect, give scope to the imagination, and refine the sensibilities, but they open not to our dim eyes and longing vision, the land of crystal founts and deathless flowers. Philosophy searches earth; religion opens heaven. Philosophy strives to reconcile us to death; but our pure religion triumphs over it. Philosophy doubts and trembles at the portals of eternity, religion lifts the veil and shows us pearly gates and golden streets lit by the Redeemer's smile, and irradiated by his countenance. Philosophy treads mid the pathway of stars, and stands a delighted listener to the music of the spheres, but religion gazes on the glorious palaces of God, while the songs of the redeemed, and the harpings of the blood-washed fall on her ravished ear. Philosophy has her place, religion her exalted sphere, one of importance here, the other of infinite, and vital importance here and hereafter.

Died of Starvation.

They forc'd him into prison,
Because he begged for bread:—
"My wife is starving—dying!"
In vain the poor man plead.

They forc'd him into prison—
Strong bars enclosed the walls;
While the rich and proud were feasting
Within their sumptuous halls!

He'd striven long with anguish,—
He had wrestled with despair,
But his weary heart was breaking,
'Neath its crushing load of care.

And he prayed then, in that prison,—
"Oh, let me seek my wife!"
For he knew that want was feeding
On the remnant of her life.

That night his wife lay moaning,
Upon her bed in pain;
Hunger gnawing at her vitals,—
Fever scorching through her brain.

She wondered at his tarrying,
He was not wont to stay:
'Mid hunger pain and watching,
The moments wan'd away.

Sadly crouching by the embers,
Her famished children lay,
And she long'd to gaze upon them
As her spirit passed away.

But the embers were too feeble,
She could not see each face.
So she threw her arms around them;—
'Twas their mother's last embrace.

They loosed him from the prison,
Like a felon from his chain,
Though his strength was hunger bitten,
He sought his home again.

Just as her spirit linger'd,
On Time's receding shore,—
She heard his welcome footsteps
Reach the threshold of the door.

He was faint and spirit-broken,
But rousing from despair,
He clasp'd her icy fingers,
As she breath'd her dying prayer.

With a gentle smile and blessing,
Her spirit wing'd its flight—
As the morn in all its glory,
Bath'd the world in dazzling light.

There was weeping, bitter weeping,
In the chamber of the dead,
For the stricken husband knew.
She had died for want of bread.

Frances Ellen Watkins.

Summary.

In the United States Senate, July 31st, Mr. Summer asked leave to introduce a bill for the repeal of the Fugitive Slave law; the question was taken and lost, yeas 10, nays 35. In the House on the Friday preceding, a proposition to the same effect was brought forward, and lost; yeas 45, nays 120.

The Platte County Self-defensive Association is the name of an organization lately formed in Missouri for the purpose of preventing the settlement of the adjacent parts of Kansas with Northerners.

Numerous fires have occurred lately in different parts of the States, by which many acres of wood land have been burnt over, extensive swamps and fields of grass laid waste, rendering, in some cases where the wind was high, the greatest exertions necessary in order to prevent the destruction of buildings. The continuance of dry weather has caused vegetation to be so combustible that it is ready to blaze on coming in contact with but a spark.

Many accidents occur in using camphene, most of them no doubt the consequence of carelessness; but there being so many more in proportion than with oil, candles, and the like that it would seem that no matter how useful it may be in public buildings, it should be banished entirely from families. Among the many accidents that we have seen noticed during the last month, the greatest number injured at once was in Cincinnatti a few days ago, where, by the explosion of one lamp, seven persons were injured; three of them—children—died in a few hours.

A great destruction of property in the Eastern Townships, C. E., has been caused by fire lately.

A fire is raging now in the woods near London, C. W.

This city was visited yesterday with a violent storm of wind and rain, just enough of the latter to revive the drooping vegetation, which had began to look quite parched, and restore to something like the proper shape, the lengthened visages of those who fate decides shall walk the pave, instead of the green sward, during the heat; but the wind gave free scope to the dust, which has been rolling so lazity in the rear of vehicles for some time past, sending it forward in a cloud, so dense as to render eye-sight and breathing apparatus for the time superfluous.

Mrs. Douglass, who was recently confined in the common jail of Norfolk, Va., for giving to youths of dark complexion moral and religious instruction, has recently published a "Personal Narrative," from which it appears she is a native of the South—no "abolitionist"—and that her pupils were the children of free colored persons.

Coal in South-Western New York.—G. L. Colegrove recently purchased in Troupsburg, Steuben Co., N. Y., 2,004 acres of land at $10 per acre, and has since fortunately discovered on his new possessions coal and iron mines, and plaster richer than that at Cayuga. He receives from the State $5,000 bounty as the first discoverer of coal in New York. He has been offered and refused $50,000 for his property. The mines seem to be excellent and inexhaustible, and the extent of his good fortune and that of the State remains to be ascertained. Mr. Colegrove's mines are only about 6½ miles from the New York and Erie Railroad.—Binghamton Republican.

On Wednesday last we had the pleasure of a call from J. H. Phipps, Esq., the Secretary and Manager of the British American Friendly Society, who is now making a tour through Western Canada on business connected with the Institution. His engagements were of such a pressing nature that they precluded him from making any stay, to bring the object and advantages of the Society before the inhabitants of Niagara, as he would like to have done. He has just returned from visiting New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, where he informs us it is in a most properous state, many of the leading men both among the clergy and laity having become members. We are happy to hear this, because we believe the more the principles of the institution are known the better they will be appreciated. The Society is progressing rapidly in Upper Canada among all classes of the people. A better investment for a man's money cannot be found.—Niagara Chronicle.

Melancholy Accident.—We are sorry to learn that a melancholy casualty occurred near the Cedars on the 21st instant. We are informed that about 4 p. m., a canoe was manned from the village of Cedars to convery Toussiant Lasparnole and Francois Deparrois to their barge, then in the Beauharnois Canal. A dense fog rendered the navigation towards the intricate channel very difficult at the time; the men, unfortunately, got astray, and the canoe was soon among the rapids and got upset. All immediately clung to the bottom of it, and in this way continued to float upwards of eight miles over all the Cedars, Splitrock, and Caskades Rapids, until they arrived at some islands opposite the village of St. Clement. Here a boy, named Pierre Paquette, swam to one of the islands and saved himself. His uncle, Martin Sauve, Toussiant Lasparnole, and Francois Deparrois, above mentioned, were compelled, from sheer exhaustion, to let go their frail support, and were drowned, one after the other, but not until every effort was made by the boy Paquette to succour them in their dreadful situation. They leave behind them families to mourn their loss; two of the unfortunate men being fathers of five young children, who, with their mothers, are thrown destitute on the world.—Montreal Transcript.

Attempt to Bury a Child Alive.

The most intense excitement has been created and prevails in the ancient city of Verulam (St. Alban's), and the adjoining vicinities, in consequence of a most diabolical attempt to murder a child, by burying it alive, under circumstances of the most cold blooded atrocity. From the most diligent inquiries it appears that a man named Michael Burke, and a female, whose name cannot be ascertained, had been employed for some days past in the neighbourhood of Barnet, South Mims, and St. Alban's. At the last mentioned place he was engaged at hay-making on a a farm near the town, at which time they had a child with them. A few days since the workmen in an adjoining field were alarmed by the dreadful screams of the child, and one of the party hastening to acertain the cause, Burke and the woman fled with the greatest precipitation. This conduct on their part excited the curiosity of the whole of the work-people, who on going to the spot that Burke had so hastily quitted, were horrified at seeing a newly made grave, and the unfortunate child, who is supposed to be the illegitimate offspring of the female, alive, but partially covered with earth; and had they not arrived so opportunely, a few shovelsfull more of the earth would, at least for a time, have concealed their unoffending and innocent victim and all traces of their diabolical crime together. The poor child was immediately extricated and removed to the workhouse, and information of the attempted murder having been given to Mr. H. Wilson, of the St. Alban's constabulary, he, with several of the workmen, set off in chase of the monsters, but were unsuccessful. Information of the inhuman circumstances having been forwarded to the metropolitan police, the most active officers were immediately dispatched in pursuit. Burke is belonging to Mayo—height about five feet seven inches, thin pale visage and no whiskers, dressed in velveteen coat and corduroy trousers; the woman with whom he travelled and cohabited is about five feet four inches in height, full breasted, and much pitted with the small pox. It is intended to apply to the Secretary of State for the Home Department to offer a reward for the apprehension of the barbarous monsters.—London Globe.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

The Conquest of Greytown.

BY THE CABINET LAUREAT.

Well, our Government's been fighting
Down along the sea,
Where we found a nameless nation
For an enemy!
And we blazed away and won it—
That great victory.

Not a soldier stood before us,
Not a cannon's roar,
Save our own resistless thunder
Broke along the shore;
Surely was so great a battle
Never fought before.

Not a rampart rose around them,
On that sea-girt plain,
When our Eagle swept to conquest
Screaming o'er the main,
And our shot upon the city
Beat like autumn rain.

Far the frightened people hurried,
From the burning town,
And, beneath the tropic's forest,
Crouched in terror down;
But our Navy from the battle
Gathered great renown.

When our gallant tars in triumph
Issued from the fleet,
Reeling in their bloodless riot,
Through the silent street,
And our conquest of the city—
Greytown, was complete.

On the top-mast by the banner,
Screams our Eagle fierce,
Far above the heaving ocean,
"Io paen –Pierce!
Io-paen we have won it,
Glory be to Pierce."

Onward rolled the note of triumph,
Onward on the wave;
Breaking where the constant billows
Far-off regions lave;
And the nations owned the prowess
Of the free and brave.

'Twas a valiant deed and mighty,
As the world may see;
Worthy our heroic rulers—
That great victory:
They and Greytown are immortal,
In all history.

Agricultural.

From the New England Farmer.

Calendar for August.

The fields are all alive with sultry noise
Of labor's sounds, and insect's busy joys;
The reapers o'er their glittering sicles stoop,
Startling full oft the patridge covers up;
Some o'er the nestling scythe go bending on;
And shockens follow where their toils have gone,
Heaving the swaths that rustle in the sun.

Clarke's Shepherd's Calendar.

August, with us, is not the principal harvest month. The wheat and rye crops are gathered in July, we believe, in all the wheat-growing States. But the oats, barley, peas and beans, and some early fruits and vegetables, are harvested in August. The late meadow grass is also cut in this month, which closes up the hay-harvest, with the exception of the "aftermath," as the English call it, or as we usually term it, the "second crop."

"The "Mirror of the Months" likens August to "that brief, but perhaps best period of human life, when the promises of youth are either fulfilled or forgotten, and the fears and forethought, connected with decline have not yet grown strong enough to make themselves felt, and consequently when we have nothing to do but look around us, and be happy." For it is in this month that the year, "like a man at forty, has turned the corner of his existence; but like him, it may still fancy itself young, because it does not feel itself getting old. And perhaps there is no period like this, for encouraging and bringing to perfection that habit of tranquil enjoyment, in which all true happiness must mainly consist; with pleasure it has indeed little to do; but with happiness it is everything.

The great pressure of the season is over, and that is what the amiable writer whom we have quoted means, when he says "we have nothing to do but look around us and be happy." For in haying and early harvest, everybody is in motion—every available hand is pressed into the service. "Haydays" do not continue long, and they must be briskly improved. But now that the grass and rye and wheat fields are smoothly shorn and their contents heaped in generous profusion in the bays and on the scaffolds of the barn, the farmer breathes freer, and looks upon the labors of his hands with a pride and satisfaction never equalled, unless, perhaps at the close of the great Indian Corn Harvest.

But mere homely cares press, and we must attend to some of the duties which particularly claim attention in August.

SAVING GRASS SEEDS.—Sufficient attention is not given to the saving of seeds. It is not a difficult matter, even without the aid of a machine for the purpose, to gather all the clover seeds that may be wanted on a farm of common size. It may be taken from the second crop, and threshed and cleaned up as are other seeds. So with herd's grass—leave a square of a few rods where the heads are large, and where no weeds are intermixed with the grass, and at the proper time cut, thresh and clean it up. Every dollar saved in this and various other ways by the farmer, will give his cash account a favorable aspect at the end of the year. Indeed, a little pains will give the small farmer all the seeds he requires, of every kind, so that he need not expend a shilling in money for them. Also, carefully preserve all other seeds which will be needed for another year's use.

BUDDING.—Most persons now understand the process—we merely remind that the time has come to do it.

DITCHING AND MEADOW MUD.—August usually offers the most favorable season for ditching swamp lands, and for throwing out a supply of meadow mud. There is scarcely a farm but needs ditching somewhere. We can refer the reader to various tracts of land where their owners have been operating in a greater or less degree for ten years, in order to bring low places into the production of good grasses natural to upland. But they have failed up to this time, though they have toiled annually to accomplish the desired object. The hands have been active, while not a ray of scientific skill has guided their operations. The perusal of the single chapter of a good work on Draining would show them how futile are such efforts against the laws of nature.

Those who have not used meadow muck will be surprised to find what a rapacious absorbant it is. If thrown out now and left where it may drain, it will become quite light in the course of three or four months, and then may be hauled in the winter at a trifling expense.

RUTA BAGAS.—Give them a dressing of ashes or superphosphorate of lime just before hoeing, leaving a row occasionally without the fertilizer, that you may note the difference between them.

LAYING LANDS TO GRASS.—August, too is a most favorable season for this operation. This practice is now, generally, well understood. On lands naturally too moist for hoed crops, it is a pleasant and profitable way of bringing it back to yield good grass crops, to plow deeply, manure well, pulverize finely, and seed liberably; and if well done in this month the young crop will gain sufficient strength to resist the freezing of winter.

THE WHEAT CROP.—There is really no necessity for the farmer to pay out much cash for flour. The winter blue-stem and omes other kinds of wheat will flourish finely on most of our New England hills, provided it be properly put in, in August or September, the ground liberally enriched and limed.—An acre will ordinarily be sufficient to supply a family of eight or ten persons. Make an experiment on a fourth of an acre, you that doubt.

These are only a portion of the things which it is particularly proper to attend to in the fervid month of August.

SOMETHING WORTH KNOWING.—We find the following in an exchange paper; and as it is by no means the first time that we have heard of the croup by the same remedy, we have little doubt of its efficacy: "My wife and I were aroused about two o'clock this morning, by the struggles of our little boy, who was labouring under a violent attack of the croup. His breathing was so difficult as to arouse persons who slept beyond the hall. I hastily folded a towel, dipt it in cold water, and applied it to his throat and breast: I then folded a sheet to the proper size, wet it and rolled him up in it, and wrapped a blanket over that. He went to sleep in three minutes, and slept until five o'clock when he got up and was dressed, and went to play in three hours after the attack, and we were rejoiced at the curative powers of cold water."

THE POET CAMPBELL.—"It is well known," says Fraser, "that Campbell's own favourite poem was his 'Gertrude.' I once heard him say, 'I never like to see my name before the Pleasures of Hope; why, I cannot tell you, unless it was that, when young, I was always greeted among my friends as "Mr. Cambell, author of the Pleasures of Hope." "Good morning to you, Mr. Campbell author of the Pleasures of Hope." When I got married I was married as the author of the Pleasures of Hope; and when I became a father, my son was the son of the author of the Pleasures of Hope." A kind of grim smile, ill subdued we are afraid, stole over our features, when, standing beside the poet's grave, we read the inscription on his coffin: 'Thomas Campbell, L. L. D., author of the Pleasures of Hope, died June 15, 1844, aged 67.' The poet's dislike occurred to our memory: there was no getting the better of the thought."

Constitution of the Provincial Union.

ARTICLE I.

We, the undersigned, associate for the purpose of carrying out the following Pledge:—

BELIEVING in the necessity of measures to further promote literature, general intelligence, active benevolence, the principles of universal freedom, and a British union not based on complexional considerations, and in the imperative duty now resting upon us to thwart the plans now maturing to array one class of Her Majesty's subjects against another, and increasing class, on the grounds of the complexional characteristics and origin of the latter, we pledge ourselves to do all in our power in our associated capacity, as Members of this Union, and in our private capacity, as citizens,—1st: To promote a healthy harmony, and to diffuse a loyal spirit among those of Her Majesty's subjects with whom we may associate, or come in contact. 2nd. To encourage and support a Press, or those Presses, in Canada, which will stand on the watch-tower to notify the citizens of this country against the unjust imputations, reflections and designs of many in the United States and this country, who would carve out a policy for emigrants, formerly bond, and free, different from white emigrants who may and do settle herein, by counselling the former to be a "good peasantry" for the latter as their highest ambition; or to aggregate themselves into exclusive communities, or to look upon the West Indies as the home for the mass, in preference to the free soil of Canada; thereby promulgating the dangerous doctrine that God's children, of different complexions, cannot live together under the protection of the British Lion, in British America, unless those of darker hue, become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to those of white complexion. 3rd. To do all in our power to remove the stain of Slavery from the face of the earth, and particularly, as subjects of Great Britain, to check its progress in America by all legitimate means; and, 5th. To encourage the rising generation in literary, scientific, and mechanical efforts. 6th. As a nucleus of operations, to support the "Provincial Freeman," as our organ, so long as it may be found to advocate sound principles, and to use our ability to promote objects in connexion with it, to further honest endeavours in this direction.

ARTICLE II.

For the better success of the above measures, the Parent Society shall consist of a President, a Vice-President, Recording and Corresponding Secretaries, Treasurer, and a Committee as extensive as the number o signatures to the Pledge.

ARTICLE III.

The annual fee of each male member shall be 2s. 6d. c'y.

ARTICLE. IV.

The Female Members shall organize a Committee, with a Moderator, Secretary and Treasurer; and the annual contribution for each member, shall be 1s. 3d.

ARTICLE V.

The object of the Ladies' Committee shall be to prepare articles for an Annual Fair, to be held in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Chatham and other large cities and towns, at which auxiliaries may be formed; also, to devise other measures for promoting the specific object; namely, the support of the people's organ, the Provincial Freeman.

ARTICLE VI.

Auxiliary Societies may be formed in each town, city, or village, in which parties may be found to take as their basis the Constitution of this Society, provided that they, at their option, make such local arrangements as the peculiarities of the case require.

ARTICLE VII.

The officers of this Society shall be elected annually, and at each annual meeting, one or more persons shall be empowered to assist in forming auxiliaries, and in whatever way the interests of the Society may demand.

ARTICLE VIII.

The Ladies' Committee shall meet every Monday evening, for the purpose of making up articles, useful and elegant; and to them shall be entrusted the details of their plans.

ARTICLE IX.

A monthly meeting of members, both male and female, shall be assembled for the purpose of promoting the literary objects specified by recitations of original pieces, reading, debates, &c. Twice in the year at the semi-annual and annual meetings parties shall be solicited to address the Society.

ARTICLE X.

This Constitution can be altered at the Annual Meeting, by a vote of a majority of members present, and the addition of the votes from each auxiliary society, through delegates from the same, provided, that at whatever place the Annual Fair may be held, the Annual Meeting shall be held for the time being.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary horrors are always increased in the case of Fugitives to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a reaction of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great humrn family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. WARD, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B GRIBBLE, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. THOMAS JAMES, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. SAMUEL RINGOLD WARD, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number:

PRESIDENT.

THE RIGHT HON. THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY.

TREASURER.

GEORGE WILLIAM ALEXANDER, Esq.

HON. SECRETARIES.

REV. JAMES SHERMAN, AND SAMUEL HORMAN-FISHER, Esq.

It was moved by the Rev. J. Wemberley, Rector of Dorrington, seconded by the Rev. George Wilkins, and adopted

"That the best thanks of this Meeting be presented to the Earl of Shaftesbury, for his kindness in presiding on the present occasion."

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1855, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Business Relations—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plans adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches auxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics and artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 12. A member of the council shall be member of only one of the committees thereof.

Art. 13. All officers holding funds, shall give security in double the amount likely to be in their hands. This security to be given to the three first officers of the council.

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper governmen

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

From the National Era.

The Birth of Christ.

Wake, harp of Zion! wake, again,
The song that royal David woke.
O! sound, once more, that sacred strain,
Responsive to his master's stroke.
Why sleeps that harp in silence now,
Which oft the monarch minstrel strung?
Why on the willows drooping bough,
Stringless and broken is it hung?
Why swells no more the solemn song,
That rose from rapt Isaiah's strings,
And lingered fondly, and so long,
O'er Judea's land, on Memory's wings?
Those holy prophets' harps, the voice of God hath stilled,
Their foremost prophecy—Christ's coming—is fulfilled.

With prophets' lips, and prophets' fire,
Those mighty seers, in days of old,
Commission'd by the Eternal Sire,
That coming of the Christ foretold,
Behold! the Son of God appears;
And hark! on this auspicious morn,
The joyous tidings greet our ears—
"The Anointed One for you was born,"
"The Wonderful, the Counsellor—
The Mighty God, the Prince of Peace!"
O! may he crush the Fiend of War,
May his dominion still increase,
'Till every knee shall bend before his glorious throne
And earth's remotest bounds his gracious sceptre own.

While trembling shepherds, through night's cold,
See light celestial round them spring,
An angel speaks: Fear not. Behold!
Good tidings of great joy I bring;
For unto you is born, this day,
A Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.*
Then winged these seraphic strains their way,
Far [illegible] with sweet accords
Glory to God in the highest! Peace
On earth, and toward all men good will.†
Those simple shepherds' [illegible]
Hope, love, and joy, their bosoms fill.
They dissolved therein, their Saviour's native sea,
And, in his manger-couch, the Lord of Glory greet.

Shout! shout! and clap thy hands, O, Earth!
Cry to that wondrous child, All Hail!
For true the Sire decreed his birth,
His saving power shall never fail.
Behold the Promised One of God!
Behold! now springs, from Jesse's Stem,
The vigorous, the verdant Rod,
The Branch‡—the Babe of Bethlehem!
All strife shall from his presence fly,
The leopard with the kid shall lie,
The lion by the fatling's side.
Unharmed, a little child the mingled herd shall lead,
Lion, like ox, eat straw, and bear with cow shall feed.§

Father of Mercy! speed the hour,
When every heart shall bow to Thee;
Destroy the despot's iron power,
And set the oppressed from bondage free.
Let not the outward tinctured skin
Annul the rights thy justice gave;
The immortal fire that burns within,
Lights up to heaven the humblest slave.
Permit not thy redeeming Book
To be perverted to the plot and
By men, who, through its spreading shoots,
To prove the guiltless stream have channel.

Literature.

From the Gospel Missionary.

Borneo.

A little volume, entitled "Letters from Sarawak," has just been published. It is just the sort of book which would delight and instruct our young readers. It is made up of eighteen letters, which Mrs. McDougall, the wife of the senior Missionary in Borneo, wrote to her son, a little boy whom she left to be educated in England. And this is Mrs. McDougall's description of the Mission-house:

"Papa had the jungle cleared from the hill on which our Mission-house was to be built, and then the top of the hill levelled for the foundation. Malays and Chinese were the labourers, but the Chinese, although they worked harder than the Malays, liked to do it their own way. They could not be persuaded to make use of wheelbarrows, but carried the earth from the hill in little baskets, slung over their shoulders, and as these baskets hold not a quarter as much as a wheelbarrow, and as they had to carry the earth some distance, their work was very slow. Nevertheless, in time the foundation was ready. Meanwhile, the timbers were squared and fitted by the Chinese carpenters, in a field near the Court House. A wooden house is joiners' work: all the great sleepers, as they called the foundation timbers, are fitted into one another, and the posts stand in them like the bottom and posts of a bed; so that all the skeleton of the house can be made, and laid by ready, and set up so quickly, that it seems to rise out of the earth like a fairy palace. Every evening I and my children used to walk up the hill, to see how the house progressed; we sat down on the great timbers, and drew the letters of the alphabet on the glistening white sand which covered the hill. Sometimes we took flowers, seeds, and cuttings of roses, and jessamines, or young fruit-trees, and planted about the house, that they might grow to a good size by the time the building was finished. The view is so lovely from thence, the winding river, the busy town, the pretty English Bungalows, with their fine background of jungle trees, and the blue mountains on either side, make as pleasant a medley of nature's repose and man's activity as can well be fancied."

When the Mission-house and Church were provided, a necessity arose for building a Hospital:—

"In August, 1850, there was a war at Sarebas, between the Chinese, who were friendly to the Dutch, and who were settled at Penancat, and the Montrado Chinese, (with the Dyaks of the country to help them,) who rebelled against the Dutch Government. The Montrados beat the Penancat Chinese, and they fled from the place, carrying with them their wives and children, and whatever goods and property they could cram into their boats. The boats were overladen, and many of them perished at sea, but some reached Tanjong Datu. On the 26th of August, 400 of these poor creatures arrived at Sarawak, saying there were 3,000 more starving on the sands at Datu, who would follow as soon as they could; and in course of time most of them did find their way up the river, though Papa and the magistrates in charge of the government, at Sarawak, did their best to persuade them to make a town at Santubong, the entrance of the Sarawak river, and settle there; but the gold workings up the river were too great a temptation to them, and every day brought boats full of Chinamen into the place. Our Rajah fed those poor people for months with rice, and gave them tools, that they might clear the ground, and make gardens in the jungle. At first, before they could build themselves houses, the whole place seemed upset by them,—many lived in their boats,—every shed and workshop in the town was full. Of course amongst such a number of people who had undergone many hardships, there was a great deal of sickness. Papa had so many patients, that he asked the Rajah to build a hospital, which he did, a temporary place at first, and afterwards the upper part of the fort was appropriated to this purpose. Our good Rajah supplies all the medicines for the inmates of the hospital, as well as for all the sick in the place; he allows them food, and a servant to wait on them; Papa is their doctor, and teaches the missionaries to assist him. The first day the hospital was opened, twenty beds were occupied. It will hold twenty-eight, and these have all been filled sometimes.

THE CHINESE SCHOOL.

It occurred to Papa, when all these Chinese strangers came to Sarawak, that some of them would be glad to have their children brought up with our seven little orphans. He went therefore to Aboo, the Chinese Magistrate, and offered to take ten children into our house, to be brought up as Christian children, baptized and educated for ten years.

The Chinese know something of the value of education, and were very glad to give them to us. I shall never forget sitting in the porch one morning, to receive my new family. Often neither parents nor children could speak any Malay; they walked up the steps leading a little boy or girl, nodded and smiled at me, then put the child's hand into mine, as much as to say, 'There, take it;' then I called one of my Chinese servants who would interpret to me in Malay, and made him tell the papa and mamma what I would do for their child, and how, if I took it, it must be really mine, until it was grown up. In this way we took Sunfoon, and Salion, Chinzu, Quafat, Assin, Umquue, Achim, boys; Achong, Mouch-moy, Poingzu, girls. None of them could speak any language except Chinese: when they came to us, it was necessary to have a Chinese servant always with them, to tell us what they said and wanted. Then the Chinese tailor, and Elizabeth and I, were all busy making them new clothes and musquito curtains. In the course of a week they were all clean and neat—their heads nicely shaved, with their long tail of hair plaited smoothly behind, and tied with red and black silk; wide blue cotton trousers fastened round their waits; and blue jackets, with little ball brass buttons. The girls dressed just like the boys, except that their jackets reached to the knee.

On Sunday they had white jackets to wear at church, and every evening to walk out in, and round wide straw hats fastened under the chin, with a string of beads, the colour of which tells which child it belongs to. These ten children soon learnt to talk Malay: then we took five more, and after that, one now and then, until our school numbered twenty-seven with our seven little orphans. I scarcely think twenty-seven English children would have been so soon and easily reduced to order as our little foreigners; their ages varied from eighteen months to twelve years, only six were girls, yet they were docile and obedient, and followed each other like a flock of sheep.

SCHOOL ON WEEK-DAY.

And now I will tell you how my children spend their day. They rise at half-past five, as soon as the day dawns: the little boys, with their towels and soap in their hands, go down to a little stream, about a hundred yards below the house in the jungle, and bathe. They have a servant with them, who sees that they wash themselves properly. The little girls bathe in Elizabeth's bath-room in the house. Then the great boys run to church, and when the bell in the porch gives them notice, they ring the church bell for early service. It goes for ten minutes, and then all the rest of the children, having eaten a great slice of cold rice pudding for their early breakfast, attend the short morning service. It takes about twenty minutes, when they sometimes have a walk, if I am with them, and the morning is not too hot; but more often they return home, and sit down to learn their lessons. By seven o'clock there is quite a buzzing of coming lessons down stairs at the long table of the school-room, which goes till half past eight, when the cook brings in an immense red earthen jar of boiled rice, and another smaller jar of fish, and vegetables curried; a pile of plates and spoons, and little tin mugs, and a teapot. The books are all cleared away, and two boys, (they all take it by turns,) set the breakfast, the plates and spoons all down on the table, and the tin mugs, and the children in their places before them. Elizabeth then comes in, and the two boys brings plates to be filled with rice, and have a proper quantity of curry juice, fish, and vegetables put over it. No one begins till all are served, then they sing a grace,—

'We thank the Lord that gives us food,
And all things else we have of good.'

A great clatter of spoons follows, and there used to be a great deal of talking, until I made a point of going down when I heard the grace sung, and sitting at the head of the table, when, if any little tongue began, I took up the plate, and threatened to remove it; once or twice I really took it away, and they soon learn that a good breakfast was better than empty talk. When all have finished, they repeat a thanksgiving grace, the fragments are collected on one plate for the dogs, and two boys sweep the room out for school.

From ten to one they are at lessons: the three eldest girls come up to me: the boys and the little ones have an English schoolmaster, and two Chinese masters, to teach them English and Chinese reading, writing, arithmetic, and geography. At one they have some more rice pudding, and a little play. From two to four, lessons again, and the girls sewing,—half-past four, dinner, which is a repetition of the breakfast, only that they have sometimes fowls or pork curried, and sometimes eggs,—at five they go to Church for afternoon service, and when that is over, I give them a singing lesson to the harmonium, which they like very much; they have learnt many simple chants and hymns, and sing in good tune, now they have learnt some time, but the Chinese are not a musical people. The lessons over, they take a walk two and two, in the public road, and when they meet the Rajah or Captain Brooke, off go all the hats, and they all cry out, "Good evening, Sir." The Rajah takes the kindest interest in these children; he always stops to speak to them, and sometimes he comes to the house to hear them sing, at others he sends for them all to cross the river to his house, and gives them a feast of fruit and cakes, and lets them play in his garden; he is constantly making presents to the school, and gives the children all the rice they eat, which is not a little.

The Generous Planter.

The incident which is embodied in this true story occurred in Cincinnati some years since, and was then published, but so long a time has passed that few will remember it.

There is in Cincinnati a large class of freed colored persons who, having been emancipated in the South and South-west, have come up there to settle, and very many of them with the sole object in view of making enough money by their labour to redeem some near relation from bondage. We have known of remarkable instances of self-denial and patient labour that have finally been crowned with success, but we cannot recall one of which we have heard, that is so full of romantic interest as the one we are about to relate. Among the freed colored persons who were labouring to purchase the freedom of their enslaved friends, there was none so untiring in efforts as Susan Wilson, the heroine of this story. She was up early and late; and although her occupation was a very laborious one and not very profitable, yet by unceasing toil, and the most rigid self-denial, she managed to lay by a considerable sum of money towards the purchase of her husband, who was still in slavery. Susan had been set free by the death of her mistress, whose favourite personal attendant she had been. The lady had owned but few slaves, and they were all in her own employ, so that they had always been comparatively comfortable. She had left Susan with her children free, but without making any provision for their support—thus showing that she thought the boon of freedom, even in a state of destitution, a sufficient restitution for years of unpaid labour which she had exacted from her slaves. Whatever Susan thought of the justice of her mistress, she was not slow to avail herself of her freedom; and after long and anxious consultation with her husband, it was agreed that she should make her way to a free State with her three small children, and by her labour endeavour to buy him.

Ben, her husband, was an excellent carpenter, and lived with his master, very near Susan's mistress. He was an excellent slave, and always cherished the thought that he would one day be free. There did not seem a very bright prospect for this, when he saw his poor wife with her three little children set out upon their journey to a land of freedom. His heart almost failed him, but still he said to himself, "They must go. If they cannot do anything for me, they will do far better for themselves in a free State than they can possibly do here, where they will not be thought even as good as slaves." And so they parted. She came to Cincinnati, and had been there about two years, labouring as a washerwoman, when my story commences. Her oldest child, Harry, was a fine stout boy of 11 years; Susan the next, was a delicate, sickly child of nine; and the youngest was a little boy of five.—They were none of them old enough to be of much asistance to their mother; yet so great was their interest in the object for which she was labouring, that all were willing and anxious to contribute something to their father's freedom. Harry could do most. He was, in fact, very useful in bringing and carrying the clothes, fetching water, making fires, and everything of the kind that he could do. Then there was a large boarding-house in the neighbourhood where Susan not only got washing from the boarders, but almost enough broken victuals for the support of her family—thus saving both money and time.

So great was her exertion that a number of charitable ladies kindly undertook, not only to supply the children with clothes, but made them up for them. Thus the poor woman's earnings were almost all hoarded up for the purchase of her husband.

The children too were as self-denying as their mother. If any kind lady or gentleman gave them a small piece of money for a little service, instead of buying candy or cakes, as most children do, it was brought home and put in a mug where their earnings were kept. Harry, during the season of blackberries, was able to earn a great deal of money. His berries were always fresh and nice-looking, and he had as many customers as he could supply. It would be impossible to tell all the little acts of self-denial by which the poor children strove to aid in the purchase of their father.

To show how they all felt about it, we must relate one little incident.

One day a lady who was pleased with the frank, good natured face of Ned, the youngest boy, called him in and gave him an orange. This was so nice that it created a desire for more. A few days afterwards, he had a small piece of money given him, and instead of taking it home to put in the mug, he bought two oranges with it. He no sooner had them in his possession than he felt he had done something that his mother and brother and sister would not think very well of. So, instead of running home delighted to show them, he came in softly, and going straight to his mother, said, "good gentleman give me money; I give it to man in shop; he give me two oranges." His mother looked sorrowfully at him, and told him she was sorry he had forgot his poor father who was a slave. And the other children said, "O! shame Ned! to buy oranges with the money for daddy's freedom!"—They would not touch a bit of them; and poor little Ned, with tears in his eyes, sat down in the corner and ate up his oranges by himself, and he was very glad when the last mouthful was gone. He said to his mother that he would never buy any more oranges, but would bring the money home for his father.

One day, Harry had been gone to the boarding-house longer than usual for the fragments for their dinner. Presently they saw him coming with a large bundle of clothes, as many as he could carry; he came panting in, full of important information.

"Oh, mother!" he cried, "there are so many strangers at Mrs. G.'s, and you'll get all the washing for them, for a good gentleman who sent you these says he will ask them.—And he was so kind to me, and I told him all how you were at work for father's freedom, and put all your money in a box, and how we put all the money we can save in a little mug; and he gave me a whole quarter to put in, and he is coming here, and I am going to show him it's the largest piece we have got yet."

Thus he ran on to his mother, full of his good news, and none of them observed that a gentleman had followed him home, and was now standing near the door in a thoughtful mood.

Susan was the first to observe him, and how her heart sunk within her when she discovered the well-known face of her husband's master! He did not know her and was surprised at her agitation. She sank down on the floor, and was unable to speak. She had not heard one word from her husband since she had left him; and in two years what might not have happened? The Cholera had been very fatal in the South, and he might be dead!

"Ah, master!" at last she cried, my poor husband, Ben, is he alive?

"Ben? what Ben? I don't know who your husband is."

"Oh, Master, Ben Wilson, your carpenter."

The gentleman was very much agitated, for he had not expected to find his carpenter's wife and children here. But he hastened to relieve the poor woman's anxiety.

"What!" said he, "is my carpenter, Ben, your husband? Oh, yes, he's alive and well, and as honest and faithful a fellow as he ever was."

"Thank God!" said the poor woman; "if he's alive I know he's good."

The slaveholder sat down on the only chair the house afforded, and the poor creatures crowded around him, beseeching him in the most piteous manner to sell the husband and father to them.

"Oh! master, see, I have got almost all the money;" and bringing her box of hoarded savings, she put it down at his feet.

"See!" cried the children, "here is all ours too!" and in his haste, little Ned upset the mug, and all the pennies and half-dimes rolled over the floor in every direction.

"Oh, master!" cried the poor wife. "won't you be willing to sell Ben? I know I have not got enough yet; for," she added proudly, "I know Ben is worth a good price."

"Isn't there almost enough?" said little Susan.

"Do please let dady be free!" said little Ned.

The planter was speechless. He was deeply touched by the scene before him. He had a heart and it was touched. He had always believed that when slaves were freed they became lazy and improvident, living by begging and stealth; but there he saw the most untiring industry and rigid economy in a poor woman and three little children, whom he would have supposed scarce able to support themselves, saving a sum of money that seemed almost incredible. We know just how much he was surprised; for we have seen in all its force this fixed belief of slaveholders, that free colored people are not able to take care of themselves. He sat looking pale and sad.

"Is master sick?" said Susan.

"Yes, good woman," said he, "sick of myself, sick of slavery, sick of everything."

Poor Susan was bewildered; but the planter, with great effort, calmly added:

"Susan, your husband has been worth more to me than all the money in that box. I have no right to any of it; keep it for yourselves. Your husband is free from this moment. May you be as happy as you deserve to be."

He then darted from the house.

Oh, how happy was that mother and children. The mother fervently thanked God for his goodness, and the children danced over the floor, knocking over the poor dinner which was set out on the washbench into the tub of suds. Harry looked a little sober at this catastrophe; but he quickly remembered the change, and cried, "Never mind; now we can buy more dinner, can't we, mother?"

When their joy somewhat subsided, they had a nice, comfortable dinner, and there was an orange purchased for the poor, sick little Susan.

But let us leave this happy family, and follow the planter. Having seen his injustice to one of his slaves, he was not long in perceiving that he had been unjust to all. He had inherited his slaves from his father, who was a simple minded, good natured man, and had never heard a word of the wrongs of slavery. Even when he went to the North, to one of the universities to be educated, he did not hear whispered a word of disapprobation. But he married at the North, and his wife could never be brought to like slavery. Her uneasiness first awakened in him a suspicion that all was not right. He encouraged her in her efforts to enlighten their slaves, and render their condition more tolerable. He was not very far from a right state of mind when he came to Cincinnati, and it only needed the unexpected meeting with the wife and children of his most valued slave, whose labour had already paid his master his marked value twenty times over—working as slaves never work, and denying themselves of every comfort of life, that they might purchase his freedom.

It was enough. He was convinced, and at once decided on his further course. He immediately returned home, and as soon as he reached his plantation, he declared to all his slaves that they were free. They gave the best evidence that he had been a good master to them by many of them remaining on his place as free labourers, and his rich reward was in witnessing their happiness and contentment.

Among the most joyous was Ben, who soon set out to join his family; and we leave our readers to imagine their meeting, and the comfort they enjoyed as the reward of their labour and self-denial.—Friend of Youth.

THE PRESS.

"It is a power beneath whose raps thrones must crumble into fragments, despots fall, manacles break, and tyranny die! It is the PRESS! Yes, the moral power of the press is already the great co-working COMPANION with the gospel of Christ! Before this instrument, as to its IDEA, was invented by the immortal Faustus, what was the condition of the world, so far as its Christian character was concerned? Let the ignorance, cruelty, bloodshed, and gloom of the dark ages send back the answer. Where then, I ask, was the Bible? It was not seen by the millions of our race! Its written manuscripts, here and there a copy, were with the Pope, the Bishop, the Priest, shut out from the light of day in some cloister's dark recess or vault. It was the strong arm of the Press that tore away the bolts and bars of its prison, demolished its doors, snatched it from its secret and silent tomb, and flung it to the hearth of the cottager, to the poor widow in her solitude, to the lonely orphan, to the prisoner in his dungeon, flung it to the world, as the world's richest treasure! The Press! that mighty engine of power and light, tyrants feared, fastened upon it a tyrant's chain, and denied or restrained its liberty. But in Young America and Old England it has broken loose. It is unchained, and before its awful power tyrants at this moment tremble and their thrones shake. It flings out its sheets by millions, and showers them over the globe. The water, the steam—yes, the lightenings of heaven—the electric power that moves the globe, have lent it their aid! I had almost said the Creator had lent it his own omnipresence in the telegraphic dispatch! It has its millions of eyes, and beholds all things that are done under heaven, and its millions of tongues, to speak alike to the cottager and king, and it speaks without fear! It is in motion, and beneath its tread the globe shakes to its centre, the moral elements are set in motion, and tyrants may as well presume to arrest the globe in its mighty course around the sun, as attempt to arrest the advancing power of the press. It proclaims alike to the world the statesman's magnanimity and greatness, the orator's eloquence, the scholar's fame, the poet's inspiration, the philanthropist's deeds in the prisoner's cell, the hero's victories in fields of war, the oppressor's wrongs, the christian's triumph, and the villain's defeat. It looks abroad with equal eye on thrones and hamlets, on the rich and poor, summons all alike to its TREMENDOUS BAR, holds them in its grasp for trial, condemns or acquits, and proclaims its verdict to the world."—Dr. Dod on Spiritualism.

Interesting Discoveries in Naples.

The extraordinary amount of antiquarian treasures constantly brought to light in the classical sites of the modern kingdom of the Two Sicilies would keep the British archæological world in a state of excitement almost dangerous. The antiquarian of the north is a much more excitable creature than his brother of the south. Here, writes a correspondent of the Morning Post, you will observe a group of curious artists at an excavation in Pompeii with as much stoic placidity as if as the workmen were digging for potatoes instead of art objects 2,000 years old. The finding of a bronze, terra cotta, or marble statue, produces no flutter among the lookers-on. They are used to such things, and a sort of unexpressed contempt illustrates the old proverb. Within the last few days another public bath house has been discovered in Pompeii. Nothing beyond the frigidarium is at present cleared, but there is every reason to believe that the building in question is more extensive than that containing the circular bath, discovered in 1824, with its six entrances, vestibule, aturium, &c. Signor Abbate, who painted the Roman interior of the Crystal Palace, is employed in making drawings of the portions of this building already laid open. In connection with Pompeii, a glass has been discovered about the size of a crown piece, which leads one to suppose it to be a magnifying lens. Now, it has been said that the ancients were not aware of this power; and the invention is given to Gallio by some, to a Dutchman, in 1621, by others; while the compound microscope is attributed to one Fontana, in the seventeenth century. But without a magnifying glass, how did the Greeks and Romans work those fine gems which the human eye is unable to read without the assistance of a glass? There is one in the Naples Royal Collection for example, the legend of which it is impossible to make out without the aid of a magnifying power. The remarkable fact is that the glass in question was found with a stone ready cut and polished for engraving thereon, which stone is now also to be seen in the Museum at Naples. It would appear, therefore, that a worker of gems possessed and used this instrument.

Hindoo Belief.

In a recent address before a meeting in this city, Rev. Dr. Duff made some interesting revelations in reference to the physical philosophy which is laid down in the sacred books of the Hindoos. They believe, for example, that there arises from the centre of the earth an immense mountain six hundred thousand miles in height, its lower base being one hundred and twenty thousand miles in breadth, and the upper part two hundred and fifty thousand miles across. Upon its upper surface are the habitations of the gods, and beneath the overhanging cliffs grow huge trees of every species. The largest of these trees shades a territorial extent of seven thousand miles. The apples which it bears are as large as elephants, and when they fall off and decay, there flows forth a river of juice, which is endowed with such virtue that any one who drinks from it will receive the boon of perpetual youth, and the sands which form its beds become pure gold upon being dried. The Hindoos have another curious belief concerning Cape Cormorin, which is a vast mass of granite rock rising abruptly from the Southern extremity of India. Their sacred books declare that many thousand years ago a mighty king ruled the country, and at the approaching marriage of his daughter, immense quantities of rice were cooked with which to make merry. The bridegroom, however, not appearing in due season, the bride became impatient, and cursed the rice, which was immediately changed into rock. Dr. Duff also remarked, among other stories of this kind, that the religion of the Hindoos would never allow them to touch a dead body, and consequently they could know nothing of their own physical structure from actual observation. Hence their original medical works are revealed by inspiration, and a plan of the inner organs of the human body, as thus revealed, is given in one of their sacred books. This plan places nearly all the organs, each of which is the seat of some faculty, feeling, emotion or desire, in the body. The lowermost one is shaped like a small tortoise; then comes a serpent; next a circle with a flower in it. This last is the seat of one of the gods, and above it are successive figures, in each of which a god is supposed to rest when he pays them a visit. Covetousness, stupidity and sleep, are represented among other emotions—the whole number of organs amounting to eighty-six. The organ which occupies the head is with them the king of birds, although with us it is of no great repute, and would probably be considered by most as an appropriate climax to the whole. It is the figure of a goose.

BALZAC AND THE THIEF.—A few nights ago, as one of our most distinguished authors, M. de Balzac, was lying awake in bed, he saw a man enter his room cautiously and attempt to pick the lock of his writing desk. The rogue was a little disconcerted at hearing a loud laugh from the occupant of the apartment, whom he supposed asleep. "Why do you laugh, sir?" asked the thief. "I am laughing, my good fellow," said M. de B, "to think what pains you are taking, and what a risk you run, in hope of finding money by night in a desk, where the lawful owner can never find any by day!" The thief "evacuated Flanders" at once.—Paris Paper.

Hudson's Bay Territory.

The Governor of this vast country, Sir Geo. Simpson, returned to Lachine on the 20th July, from a tour of inspection of some of the Hudson's Bay Company's establishments in the interior of Rupert's Land. We are glad to learn that, throughout, the country was found to be healthy, prosperous, and tranquil, and civilization is making wide and rapid strides among the natives, many of whom, in various parts of the country, are partially abandoning hunting, and directing their attention to the cultivation of the soil, with the most happy results, both as to their physicial comfort and mental advancement. The Red River settlement—which now contains a population of 8,000 souls—presents, we are told, a picture of abundance, happiness and contentment, but rarely to met with in communities, whose nearer proximity to the great centres of civilization affords them many advantages not possessed by their brethren at the outposts. If, however, they are deprived of some of the luxuries of a high state of civilization, they have most of the comforts of life at their command, and are free from many of the wants and temptations of a more artificial state of society. It is from this flourishing settlement that we may look for the ultimate extension of the blessings of religion, morality and civilization, throughout the wide spread but thinly inhabited north-western section of the continent, and here, we are informed, the Roman Catholic and Church of England Bishops, as well as the Scottish Presbyterian pastor (the Rev. John Black) are indefatigable in their exertions to instruct and educate in their respective flocks, and promote their temporal as well as their spiritual interests. Nor is it to be supposed the Wesleyans would be behind their fellow-labourers in this extensive—and, from what we learn, far from barren—field of missionary labor. We accordingly find that Sir George Simpson, on the 12th July, met the Rev. John Ryerson and several missionaries of his church, with their families, near the height of land between Lake Superior and Winnepeg, on their way to Hudson's Bay, all in good health and spirits, and full of hope and zeal in the cause, for which they are ready "to spend and be spent." The season has been unusually moist in the territory north of the Sault Ste. Marie, beyond which point the cholera had not yet extended, but at and in the neighborhood of which we regret to learn, the pestilence was making fearful ravages. We also regret, although we cannot say we are disappointed, for hopes on the subject have long departed—to find Sir George Simpson obtained no additional information respecting Sir John Franklin. No intelligence had been received at Red River, or elsewhere, from Dr. Rae, or the other expeditions in the Arctic Seas, nor do we understand there is the slightest hope entertained, in any part of the country bordering on those seas, of any further light being thrown upon the fate of the gallant but ill-fated explorers.—Montreal Herald.

Increase in Rates of Travel, &c.

A convention was held in New York, on Tuesday, composed of representatives of the roads connecting the Atlantic coast with the west. The New York Central, Hudson River, and New York and Erie, and the Hudson Steamboat Company, each had deputations present, as well as the Baltimore and Ohio, the Philadelphia and Baltimore, and Pennsylvania roads.

The result of the consultations of this convention, involve a general advance of charges on freights and passengers, and a reduction of speed and amount of service. The New York Central feels abundantly able, under the overpowering strength which it secured from the legislature of that state, a year ago last winter, to withstand any hostility which may be excited by any of these measures, and the league between the great routes will effectually exclude any idea of competition.

Through fares from New York to Buffalo are to be advanced on the 1st September to $8, and to $9 during the winter seasons. Freights to be advanced about 10 per cent. at present, with a further advance hereafter. There is also to be an entire discontinuance of the system of runners and western agents, which will be an immense saving to all the roads. The system of free passes has been materially abridged by resolution, and its entire abolition submitted to the consideration of the presidents of the various roads.

A uniform classification of freights on all the four great lines, has been adopted, and the charges equalized. It was found, upon comparison with other freight, that the mail service was performed at a cheaper rate than any other branch of service, and steps are to be taken to obtain a commensurate increase of compensation. The mail compensation was estimated to be 25 per cent, cheaper than the lowest grade of freight. The specific reduction of speed and service will be settled between the Central and Erie roads. The action of this convention, says the Times, must result in a large saving of running expenses to the roads, and a considerable increase of the gross earnings. The agreements of the convention, strictly adhered to, would add half a million of dollars to the net earnings of both the Erie and Central Roads. Detroit Inquirer.

Brutality of the Russians.

A correspondent writes from Bucharest, on the 30th July, to the Vienna Lloyd: "You can form no idea of the brutality of the Russians to their proteges. On their flying retreat they have taken every description of cattle and provisions they could find, and have carried off with them all those instrumental in maintaining security and order, leaving this poor land in the greatest misery. The people remain quiet and orderly, rejoicing that those northern guests are at last obliged to leave us. I say 'obliged.' General Adlerberg, as I learn from the best instructed sources, arrived at the head-quarters of Prince Gortschakoff with a despatch from his Majesty the Czar, commanding the Prince to employ every strategetical means to drive the Ottomans from Wallachian ground. Gortschakoff explained to the General the impossibility of fulfilling the imperial mandate. Adlerberg arrived at Fratesti at the time that Gortschakoff was drawing up his plan of retreat. At this interview a rancorous and violent discussion took place between the two Generals of the Czar. In the presence of his aides-de-camp, Adlerberg upbraided the Prince with an endless neglect of his duty, and even intimated that he was guilty of cowardice. The Prince, like most Russian officers, is very irritable, would hear no more, but said that Adlerberg being the courier of the Czar, his duty was to deliver his despatches, and receive the answer; further, he had no business in the camp. To this Adlerberg, who is more of the courtier than the warrior, answered tranquilly that he would rather be 'a conscientious and faithful courier, than a beaten and retreating General.' In the course of the altercation, personalities and invectives were freely exchanged. By the interposition of an officer in high command, the two generals were apparently reconciled."

Anti-Slavery Doings in Salem—Release of a Slave—Exciting Scene.

Messrs. Editors:—The Anniversary of the Western Anti-Slavery Society was held in Salem, Columbiana county, on Saturday, Sunday and Monday last. The attendance was large, filling the Church on the first and last days, and the Great Tent of the Society on Sunday. * * * * *

Just before the adjournment of the meeting, a telegraphic despatch was received, stating that a slave girl was on her way in the train that left Pittsburgh at 3 P. M.

All the Abolitionists, of every stripe, forthwith resolved themselves into a Committee of Vigilance, and the determination was unanimous, that no slave should pass through that town without an attempt for his deliverance. Of course, the person claimed was not a slave, having become legally emancipated by touching Free Soil, with the consent of her master.

But the question was, how to secure the right of the slave to herself, which had been thus unintentionally restored to her. As there was no time for legal measures of a formal character, the entire Convention, accompanied (I should judge) by the chief of the population of the town, repaired to the station, where they were addressed from the platform of the railway (converted, for the nonce, into an Anti-Slavery platform) until the train arrived.

Then a self-appointed Committee of men of eminent gravity, entered the car in which the party was, and the first inquiry was made of the slave (who was found to be a child of ten or twelve years) by a colored man, as to who she was, and where going! The mistress promptly replied for her chattel, that it was none of his business.

A white gentleman then inquired if the girl were a slave: to which the mistress readily answered that she was. The colored man then asked the child if she wished to be free, to which she replied yes. Then the girl was taken up boldly by the men present and carried out upon the platform!

The mistress showed very good fight, and called her husband, who gave all the assistance that the most eloquent swearing and loud outcries of murder could afford.

After the freedom of the child had been secured, the master and mistress expressed their willingness to execute free papers, provided she could be restored to them.

This was held for further advisement. Finally, the train moved off, amid loud cheers on the part of the crowd.

Thus by a prompt and decisive action, the critical moment was seized, and a child free by the laws of Nature and Ohio, was saved from being carried back to a life of Slavery. Being a slender age, she could not be regarded as competent to decide whether she should remain or go back; and her self-appointed guardians only did what the plainest principles of humanity and law dictated for the salvation of an innocent child from so dreadful a fate.

Fugitives in Canada.

Rev. C. C. Foote, Agent of the Refugee Home Society, has sent us an appeal in behalf of this class of our fellow-men, which he requests us to publish. We are compelled to abridge it.

Boxes of clothing that are designed as an answer to this appeal, should not be sent to New York, but directly to him, marked "C. C. Foote, care of Horace Hallock, Detroit, Michigan."

Detroit, July, 1854.

Will you allow me space in the Missionary for a few statements in behalf of the Refugees in Canada? It is believed by those best acquainted with the facts, that arrivals from the South have been greatly increased during the past spring and present summer. Scarcely a day passes that does not witness the arrival of from one to a dozen. There is almost every possible condition among these new-comers. To-day a man from South Carolina, who has been in Canada one month, called upon me to aid him out of distress caused by sickness. This man writes a fair, legible hand, has got up a Sabbath-school, and is about starting a class in music. He is highly intelligent, and appears to be a devoted Christian. Men and women of superior intelligence and worth are often found here, whose plight is caused less from their own hardships, than the dreaded doom of their offspring! Here are also to be found multitudes in the profoundest ignorance of well-nigh all things save the love of liberty! These poor creatures are thrown upon the shore of Canada with almost none to care for them. They cannot all find work at once. If they have a little money, they are soon fleeced out of it by the exorbitant exactions of the boarding houses. * * * * * The terrible sufferings and privations often endured by fugitives in their flight, render them vulnerable to disease; hence there are always more or less upon the sick-list. At the present time there is an unusual amount of sickness in and about Windsor and Sandwich, and consequently of suffering. * * * * * * * A brother in Massachusetts sent us an excellent letter last spring, containing five dollars, with a request that we would inform him of the use made of it. This letter, with an answer to the inquiry, was placed in the hands of Henry Bibb, to be published in the Voice of the Fugitive; but Mr Bibb went immediately thereafter to a sick bed, from which death has since relieved him, and the letter, with the brother's name, was lost. With the hope of this statement falling under his eye, it is here inserted.

The last box of clothing received here was a royal one from the ladies of Chicago. It was distributed by my hands. And could these "Dorcases" have seen the happy faces of many a shivering man, woman, and child, as these warm garments were placed in their hands, they would have felt themselves amply repaid for their labors. In the spring my friends in Troy sent me several barrels of provisions, which were a great help to the settlers in the woods. I find not the least difficulty, but great pleasure in these distributions, and hope they may be greatly multiplied during the coming fall and winter. Such garments and bedding as are needed in any family are needed here—new, or comparatively so, and plain.

As much of my time is spent in the service of the refugees, it will be a pleasure to correspond with all persons solicitous for their welfare.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Friday, August 11.

THE SLAVE TRADE IN CUBA.

The Earl of Clarendon, in laying upon the table despatches from Her Majesty's Consul-General at the Havana, which had arrived so recently that they had not been included among the papers already presented to their Lordships, observed that, as it had often been his painful duty to call attention to the negligent manner in which the Treaties between Spain and this country, with reference to the Slave-trade, had been carried out, he had now great satisfaction in stating that since the appointment of the last Captain-General of Cuba, a marked improvement in the mode of executing the Treaties had been apparent; regulations of the most useful kind had not only been adopted, but carried into effect; a system for the registration of slaves had been established throughout the island; and all officials who were found to be connected with the traffic in slaves were immediately removed. The Consul-General stated that, under orders that had been issued, he understood that nearly all the most recently imported Africans had been released from slavery, and that the officer who was employed by the Spanish Government in this service had displayed great energy and activity in the performance of his duty, by tracing and following up the negroes brought over, and releasing them. The despatch stated, "I have no hesitation in acquainting your Lordship that these energetic measures cannot fail to have a most salutary effect, and that the Government are determined to enforce the observance of the Treaties."

Second Common Law Procedure Bill.—The Commons' Amendments to this Bill were considered and agreed to.

The Consolidated Fund Appropriation Bill was read a third time and passed, also the Customs Bill.

Adjourned at a quarter past six o'clock.

Saturday, August 12.

Her Majesty prorogued Parliament on Saturday with the accustomed formalities. The seats in the House of Lords were taken possession of by a host of brilliantly-attired ladies. Several illustrious Orientals, in the gorgeous costume of the East, were present in different parts of the House. At the special request of Her Majesty, His Royal Highness the Maharajah Dulcep Singh was accommodated with a place on the woolsack directly facing the Throne. In the gallery, to the left of the throne, were His Royal Highness Goolam Mahmood, His Royal Highness Ferose Shah, and the Rajah of Coorg. In the same gallery, towards the further end, were Suleiman Pasha Iskander Bey, and several officers of the Egyptian army. Vely Pasha, the Ottoman Ambassador to France, was also present. Among the diplomatic body, were the Turkish, Austrian, Prussian, and Neapolitan Ministers, all in full parti-coloured costume, and glittering with decorations. Among them, in plain dress, was Mr. Buchanan, the Minister of the United States.

About half-past one, the Lord Chancellor took his seat on the woolsack. Prayers were then read by one of the Bishops, and were observed by the illustrious Orientals with a becoming appearance of reverence and respect. About two o'clock the Earl of Aberdeen arrived, and remained in the House till the guns warned him of Her Majesty's approach. Precisely at a quarter past two the procession entered the House, the Earl of Aberdeen carrying the sword of state, the Marquess of Lansdowne the crown, and the Marquess of Winchester the cap of maintenance. Her Majesty entered accompanied by Prince Albert, and attended by several ladies of her court. According to the etiquette of the occasion, the whole of the persons assembled rose on the entrance of the Queen. On taking her place on the Throne, Her Majesty twice or thrice intimated in the ordinary mode—a gracious inclination of the head—that they should be seated; but, as the sign was not understood, Her Majesty requested the Earl of Aberdeen to announce to them her pleasure that they should be seated. Then came a pause of several minutes—a pause, indeed, of rather unseemly length—the Deputy Usher of the Black Rod having been directed to summon the Lower House, and the Commons apparently not being quite ready to attend the summons. At last, however, the Speaker appeared at the bar, accompanied by several Members of the Commons, Lord J. Russell, Mr. Walpole, Mr. B. Osborne, and Mr. I Butt being of the number. The Speaker then addressed Her Majesty very nearly in the following terms:—

"We, your Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, attend your Majesty with the last Bill of supply for the service of the year.

"In reviewing the labours of the past Session, we have humbly to thank your Majesty for your gracious permission to bring under our annual review a large amount of the public expenditure connected with the revenue departments which have hitherto been exempt from Parliamentary control. It will be our duty in future years, with a just regard to economy, to make ample provision for these important branches of the public services.

"In obedience to your Majesty's commands, we have endeavoured to impose an effectual check on bribery and corrupt practices at elections, and we venture to hope that the Act lately passed, which clearly defines these offences, applies to them an adequate punishment, and places election expenses under efficient control, will prove successful in repressing a practice which is alike demoralising to the elector and subversive of the integrity of representative institutions.

"We have given the most attentive consideration to a measure for the just government and extension of the University of Oxford, by which certain oaths now required to be taken by students have been abrogated—provision made for the establishment of private halls, and enlarged powers given both to the University and its colleges. We have every confidence that these enactments will be received by that learned body in the spirit in which they have been framed, and that they will be able to extend the benefits of academical education to classes of the community who, from their circumstances or religious opinions, have hitherto been precluded from the enjoyment of this privilege.

"Various other measures have been submitted to us, but it has been found impossible to mature them during the Session, as the progress of our legislation has been interrupted by the commencment of a War which, notwithstanding your Majesty's unremitting endeavours to maintain peace, has been pressed upon us by the unwarrantable aggression of Russia on the Turkish empire.

"Deploring most deeply the necessity of such contest, we recognize the inperative duty of protecting an old and faithful ally from oppression, and vindicating the rights of nations.

"And we believe it well becomes the character and honour of this great empire, adhering to the faith of Treaties, to frustrate, if possible, the designs of a Monarch, whose ambition, if uncontrolled, would endanger the security of every nation in Europe.

"Entertaining these views, your faithful Commons have cheerfully, and without hesitation, placed at the disposal of your Majesty whatever supplies have been requisite to carry on this just and unavoidable War, thus enabling your Majesty to send forth fleets and armies complete beyond all former precedent in discipline and equipment.

"The efforts of your Majesty to strengthen the army and aid the cause of Turkey have been cordially seconded by the Emperor of the French, and the joint forces of England and France, their ancient hostility converted into generous emulation, now threaten the coasts and harbours of Russia, to the most distant extremity of her vast dominions.

"The issue of this eventful struggle is in the hands of an over-ruling Providence. Confident in the justice of our cause, we look forward with hope to the successful termination, acknowledging, with the deepest gratitude, that, while War, with all its horrors, is raging abroad, your Majesty's subjects, under your Majesty's well-ordered and beneficent rule, are enjoying the blessings of uninterrupted tranquillity at home.

"I have now to pray your Majesty's assent to a Bill for the appropriating of the sum voted for the service of the year."

The Royal Assent having been given to the Bill, as also to the Customs Bill, and to the Russian Government Securities Bill,

The Lord Chancellor advanced, and on bended knee presented her Majesty with the following speech, which Her Majesty read in a clear distinct voice:

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—

"I am enabled, by the state of public business, to release you from a longer attendance in Parliament:—

"Gentlemen of the House of Commons.

"In closing the Session, it affords me great pleasure to express my sense of the zeal and energy you have shown in providing means for the vigorous prosecution of the War in which, notwithstanding my efforts to avert it, we are now engaged. This liberality in granting supplies for the public service, demands my warmest thanks; and although I lament the increased burdens of my people, I fully recognize your wisdom in sacrificing considerations of present convenience, and in providing for the immediate exigencies of the War, without an addition being made to the permanent debt of the country.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,—

"In cordial co-operation with the Emperor of the French, my efforts will be directed to the effectual repression of that ambitious and aggressive spirit on the part of Russia, which has compelled us to take up arms in defence of an ally, and to secure the future tranquillity of Europe.

"You will join with me in admiration of the courage and perseverance manifested by the troops of the Sultan in their defence of Silistria, and in the various military operations on the Danube.

"The engrossing interest of matters connected with the progress of the War has prevented the due consideration of some of those subjects which, at the opening of the Session, I had recommended to your attention; but I am happy to acknowledge the labour and diligence with which you have perfected various important measures, well calculated to prove of great public utility.

"You have not only passed an Act for opening the Coasting Trade of the United Kingdom, and for removing the last legislative restriction upon the use of Foreign Vessels, but you have also revised and consolidated the whole statute law relating to Merchant Shipping.

"The Act for establishing the direct control of the House of Commons over the charges incurred in the collection of the revenue, will give more complete effect to an important principle of the Constitution, and will promote simplicity and regularity in our system of public accounts.

"I rejoice to perceive that amendments in the administration of the law have continued to occupy your attention, and I anticipate great benefit from the improvement you have made in the forms of procedure in the Superior Courts of Common Law.

"The means you have adopted for the better government of the University of Oxford, and the improvement of its constitution, I trust will tend greatly to increase the usefulness and to extend the renown of this great seminary of learning.

"I have willingly given my assent to the measures you have passed for the prevention of bribery and of corrupt practices at elections; and I hope that it may prove effectual in the correction of an evil which, if unchecked, threatens to fix a deep stain upon our representative system.

"It is my earnest desire, that, on returning to your respective counties, you may preserve a spirit of union and concord. Deprived of the blessings of peace abroad, it is more than ever necessary that we should endeavour to confirm or increase the advantages of our internal situation; and it is with the greatest satisfaction that I regard the progress of active industry, and the general prosperity which happily prevails throughout the country.

"Deeply sensible of these advantages, it is my humble prayer that we may continue to enjoy the favour of the Almighty; and that, under His gracious protection, we may be enabled to bring the present contest to a just and honorable termination."

The Lord Chancellor then declared that it was Her Majesty's pleasure that Parliament should stand prorogued till Thursday, the 19th of October, and that Parliament was accordingly prorogued till that date.

SLAVE TRADE.

On the order for the third reading of the Consolidated Fund (Appropriation) Bill.

Mr. Hume called attention to the report of the last Session on the Slave Trade, and urged renewed application for the fulfilment of the Treaties with Spain for a total suppression of the trade to Cuba, the only place, he said, where slaves were now carried. He acknowledged that everything had been done by her Majesty's Government that could be done with the Government of Spain, but all efforts were defeated by the venality of the Cuban authorities, countenanced by members of the Royal Family of Spain, who were connected with the trade.

Lord J. Russell, said, it was, no doubt, much to be lamented, after what had been done by Great Britain, France, the United States, the maritime powers of Europe, and lately by Brazil, to extinguish the Slave Trade, that it should still be carried on under the protection of Spain at Cuba. Measures, however, had been taken of a most stringent nature for the liberation of all negroes recently brought into the island, and for the infliction of penalties upon offenders. If these measures and others of a similar kind were carried into full effect, in conjunction with a system of registration, the importation of slaves into Cuba would be prevented. Unfortunately, it was too true that the venality of official persons opposed obstacles, and it was notorious that Queen Christina derived a considerable profit from the traffic in slaves. A change had, however, taken place in the Government of Spain, and General Concha had been appointed Governor-General of Cuba. There was every disposition to put down this trade on the part of Her Majesty's Government, who would keep a watchful eye on the subject, and exert every effort to accomplish the great object of putting a total stop to this abominable traffic.

Sir G. Pechell recommended the employment of a strong naval force on the coast of Cuba, with screw steamers of small draught.

News by the "Europa."

THE WAR.

From Vienna, the 16th, it is telegraphed: "There is reason to believe that Prince Alexander Gortschakoff this morning notified the Austrian Government, that as long as the Turks are in Wallachia the Russians will retain certain strategetic points in the Principalities. Austria has given up the intention of proposing to the Germanic Diet to put the federal army on a war footing."

THE BALTIC.

The Paris Moniteur announces that on the 7th and 8th August, the French expeditionary force was landed on the Island of Aland, north of the fortress of Bomersund. At the same time a force of English and French marines landed south of the fortress The disembarcation was covered by war steamers, and was effected as the Moniteur says, without a man getting his feet wet. They then erected their batteries, while the Russians destroyed theirs, and fell back on the main fortress. By the 12th the fortress was completely invested. On the 15th, the Russians made a sortie, but were driven in. On the 15th the French carried a redoubt of 8 guns, without losing a man. Another account says it was a strong fort they took, after several hours' fighting,

The bombardment of the main fortress was to begin on the 16th.

Reports in the English papers say that the inhabitants of Aland had risen against the Russians, and it was proclaimed, by order of the French Admiral from the pulpits of all the churches, that the Russian sway on the islands had ceased.

THE DANUBE.

The aspect of affairs on the Danube is quite unchanged.

The Russians continue to fortify all strategetic points as they advance.

The London Daily News contains a remarkable special correspondence, stating that the British troops in camp at Monastir, near Devna, are decimated by malignant cholera, totally destitute of medicine, famishing for lack of food, and are discontented and almost disorganized. The Times correspondent partly confirms the statement.

Prince Paskiewitch returned to Warsaw on the 13th, and will again take the command of the Southern army.

THE BLACK SEA.

As yet nothing has been done.

Constantinople letters speak of the expedition against the Crimea as still in progress, but embarcation is deferred on account of the cholera.

Important news from the East is not expected before the first week in September.

A Russian dispatch from Odessa, Aug. 6, says: "The allied fleets tried to land troops at Balaklawa, Crimea."

At Sebastapol it was reported that Admiral Lyons had bombarded Anapa for 24 hours. The result was unknown.

The Sultan's daughter, Princess Fatima, was married to Reschid Pacha's son, at Constantinople, on the 10th inst.

The Russian fleet came out of Sebastopol and was seen off Odessa, but they returned in safety.

ASIA.

On the 4th August, an offensive and defensive alliance was concluded between the Porte and Schamyl. The terms have not transpired. It is, however, understood that Schamyl insisted that the Porte should recognize the independence of Circassia; he in return offering the assistance of 50,000 mountaineers to act in concert with the Turkish forces.

It is said that Schamyl has obtained a great victory over the Russians, but Russian reports state that General Wrangel had advanced with the Russian troops from Ervan, and defeated the Turks near Bajazid, with great slaughter, captured eight guns, and afterwards occupied Bajazid.

Mercantile letters from Bagdad say that contracts have been made to furnish supplies and transports for a Hindoo British force which would arrive via the Persian Gulf, and be landed at Baza, mouth of the river Tigris.

The Emperor of Morocco has announced his intention to present the Sultan with thirty millions of piastres, and 12,000 troops annually, while the war lasts.

GREAT BRITAIN.

A Turkish Loan of £5,000,000 sterling, guaranteed on the Turkish revenue and Egyptian Tribute, has been opened at Paris and London at 6 per cent £3,000,000 at 80 now, and the balance 6 months hence at 85. The loan is already taken at 2 to 5 per cent. premium.

The U. S. sloop-of-war Marion, left Gambia on the 17th July for Cape de Verde.

Accounts of the potatoe disease in the north of Ireland, are more discouraging. It seems to be spreading, though not rapidly.

Cholera was prevailing with considerable severity in Belfast.

The poor rates just struck for the requirements of the present year show an increase in the greater number of the Irish Unions.

FRANCE.

The Fete of St. Napoleon, on the 15th inst., passed off quietly.

Russian intrigue is said to be busy in the secret clubs.

President Pierce's message to the Senate, respecting Cuba, caused uneasiness on the Paris Bourse, but the succeeding mail restored confidence.

Cholera is decreasing at Marseilles.

Rev. C. C. Foote's Begging Operations.

The abridgement of a letter from C. C. Foote—to be found in another column—which we copy from the American Missionary, is a very skilfully arranged and highly gilded bait, which, coming from such high authority, will, we suppose, be greedily swallowed, by those for whom it is intended. Mr. Foote, has just given enough of the truth—and in such a way—as to create a false impression and to awaken the sympathies and open the purses of those unacquainted with the true state of affairs. The intention to mislead is evident, from the fact that Mr. Foote is in a position enabling him to know, and state what he knows, if necessary. He begins by saying, "It is believed by those best acquainted with the facts, that arrivals from the South have been greatly increased during the past spring and present summer. Scarcely a day passes that does not witness the arrival of from one to a dozen. There is almost every possible condition among these new comers." Now, touching the first sentence which we have quoted, Mr. Foote, as a paid sentinel on duty, must know that a large proportion of the arrivals during the spring and summer, were of free persons, mostly from the middle and Western states, whole families moving in, bringing with them, in a majority of cases, not only the money, with which to purchase homes, but their household furniture. Do slaves just escaping from their masters carry with them such encumbrances? Again, the number of arrivals. It is true that the number is great, "greater than ever before," says every one; but, mainly of a class which before this year has been small, of free persons. On one day alone, in the spring, forty landed at Windsor, the majority of whom were from one county in Pennsylvania. Now, we ask,—How is it that Mr. Foote, residing in Windsor, almost within a "stone's throw" of the Ferry and Railroad Station, is not cognizant of these facts? This explains the meaning of the declaration that "There is almost every possible condition among these new comers," which is strictly true, though Mr. Foote could not have intended that it should be taken in a literal sense, else why place it under the head of an appeal in aid of Refugees, and immediately illustrate, by the case of a man in distress, while not a word is said of other conditions. Again, the "multitudes in the profoundest ignorance of well nigh all things, save the love of liberty," exist only in Mr. F.'s imagination, as can be easily proven by any one who has the time to make a tour of the country around. They will find them in general to be men and women of sound sense, who have been educated in the school of experience; but who, nevertheless, are well aware of the value of a "good education;" who prove the falsity of the statement by always evincing a firm opposition to begging in their name, and who are advancing as rapidly in wealth, and intelligence, according to their past and present opportunities, as their white neighbours. Most escaping from slavery to that point are from Kentucky, Tennessee, and other Western slave states, where slavery exists in its mildest form, and where the intellect is not so much crushed as in some other localities.

Again, he says, "they cannot all find work." Facts, are contrary to the truth of this statement; for all that come directly from slavery, be it remembered, are not field hands, but among them are found some of the best mechanics in the west, for whom there is a constant demand. Colored mechanics! yes, Refugees, as Mr. Foote delights to call them, build houses, from the foundation to the last touch of the paint brush. Those accustomed to other employments, get work at all times. Even in winter, as much work can be got at chopping in the "Bush" as is applied for. On one occasion, in the spring of 1853, twenty-nine came over at once, just from slavery; they were immediately supplied with employment. During the succeeding summer, the wages for harvesting, for ten miles around Windsor, and on farms adjoining the land where live the "settlers in the woods," whom Mr. Foote mentions in connection with "several barrels of provisions," was $1 25c., per day, and board, in consequence of the great demand for labourers on the Railroad, then in course of construction. In the winter following, we had the pleasure of being in Windsor, where we availed ourselves of the opportunity which was largely presented to us of coming in contact with "the poor creatures." Board was then $2 25c. to $3. per week, and yet one man who came over in midwinter, assured us that he cleared more than $4 per week, just by sawing wood in Windsor and Sandwich, for he did not dare venture to Detroit. The only case of suffering—which was but slight—was that of a widow with two children, who came in the fall, and was in a poor state of health—her necessities were administered to, by her immediate neighbours.

The statement about the royal box of clothing, caps the climax. He says the last box of clothing received here was a royal one; also that he distributed it; but does not tell where. Yet, the announcement of help to settlers in the woods, after the box story, leads to the natural inference that it was distributed in Windsor. For although Mr. Foote dates from Detroit, Michigan, just opposite Windsor, in Canada,—though supposed to be living in Windsor,—he cannot mean that he is giving them away to the people of Detroit. Therefore, we pronounce the statement of Mr. Foote in regard to the "happy faces of many a shivering man, woman, and child," a sheer fabrication; for if there was any such distribution of clothing made, those who obtained it took care that it should not be known.

It is a well-known fact, that the inhabitants of Windsor have held meetings, and sent out remonstrances against just such beggars in their name, and in opposition to their wishes, as is Mr. Foote. Last November, a man from Chicago came to Windsor, and announced to the colored people that he had three tons of clothes sent by the Western women. The people called a meeting, to which the "friend" was invited, and there showed him by the unanimous voice of the house, that they wanted no gifts of the kind. Said Mr. C. Freeman, a man whose locks are "white with the frosts of many winters," when addressing him, "For God's sake, Sir, take them away; we have been already sufficiently cursed with such things;" which advice he followed, for not an article was left. By the "settlers in the woods," we presume that reference is made to the occupants of the Refugees' Home, partly the scene of Mr. Foote's operations. Now, about the settlers, we claim to have some knowledge, having lived for several months within two miles of, and coming in contact with, some of them every few days. In the first place, there are only about ten or a dozen families on the whole of the broad acres owned by the Society in Canada; and unless there has been additions lately, not so many, though immediately around them are men like themselves, formerly slaves, who have come in and purchased farms of from 40 to 170 acres; the most of them since the establishment of the Home, but who could not be induced to purchase on it, partly on account of the limited number of acres allowed them, and partly of the begging connected with it, which, if at all necessary, is rendered so by the fact that all of the occupants, with one or two exceptions, are either old men who have gone there because they feel that their days are nearly numbered, and therefore do not need much, or worthless young men. The "settlers in the woods" are, or were as lately as last April, habitual drinkers of intoxicating liquors,—which fact was known to C. C. Foote, Agent of the R. H. Society—although the Constitution requires that persons should be temperate in order to the holding of lots there. Mr. Mead, one of the wire-pullers in Detroit, some months ago, in conversation with a colored man from Windsor, to whom he communicated the intelligence that Mr. Foote was going over to Canada to reside, said, "We have good property in Canada, and we want some one to take care of it." Only last week, we had occasion to notice something of the same nature as this "appeal," emanating from a person residing about eighteen miles from Windsor; but it did not rise to the dignity of an appeal from the Agent of the R. H. Society, endorsed by the American Missionary. In conclusion, we will give what may be considered as the dying testimony of one, for years an advocate of the "begging," whose house was a depot for the reception of "boxes of clothing," and who was an active member of the R. H. Society, if not until his death, at least until a short time before it occurred.

We refer to the late Henry Bibb, of Windsor, Editor of the Voice of the Fugitive, who, last February, in consequence of having received a visit from a gentleman from Michigan, that visited Canada for the purpose of ascertaining whether the statements of a man who had been in Michigan some time before, collecting funds in the name of the fugitives in Canada, were true, appointed a meeting in regard to the matter. He there, to the surprise of all present, took grounds against the begging, and said that it was not needed.

Mr. Freeman, the gentleman referred to in connection with the man from Chicago, arose, and said that he could not understand how it was that Mr. Bibb, who had before advocated the sending forth of Agents and reception of clothing, in opposition to the wishes of the people, should now express himself in that manner.

Mr. Bibb, in reply, said, that when he advocated the measure, he thought that it was necessary, and that Father Freeman must not blame him because his conversion did not take place before; but that he was now fully convinced that such doings were, and ever had been, unnecessary. "Whoever"—said he, elevating his hand—"undertakes it, may prosper for a while, but they will in the end have a fall." C.

The Rev. M. M. Dillon, a Missionary from the Colonial Church and School Society, in England, having recently arrived in Canada, is desirous of addressing the colored residents of Toronto, and citizens generally, in the Methodist Chapel, on Sayer Street, (D. Vegetarian Society.

A Convention of the Vegetarian Society assembled at Philadelphia, Aug. 30. After discussing the principles of Vegetarianism, and adopting resolutions, a grand banquet was partaken of by about 150 persons. It was served up in true vegetarian style, without "flesh or fish." Some highly interesting speeches were delivered, in response to the various sentiments.

Crops in Great Britain.

In England, the crops generally promise an abundant harvest. The potatoe disease has appeared in some counties.

In Wales the crops are luxuriant, with the exception of the potatoe, which is affected with blight.

The potatoe disease has appeared in some parts of Scotland, and is progressing rapidly. From the great breadth sown, it is feared that the loss will be very great.

Crops in the County of Limerick, Ireland, are all very promising. There are rumours of the spread of the potatoe disease in some of the other counties of Ireland to quite an alarming extent.

Health Items.

The cholera broke out at Fall River, Mass., last week, and nineteen deaths occurred in two hours.

There were fifty deaths from yellow fever at the Charity Hospital, New Orleans, in five days of last week.

The yellow fever is raging in Savannah, Georgia.

At Marietta, Georgia, the typhus fever is now prevalent.

At Charleston, S. C., there were 20 deaths from yellow fever last week.

In Chicago, Ill., there were 37 deaths from cholera during the same time.

NOTICES.

The American Phrenological Journal, for September, is on our table. As usual, replete with matter highly interesting to the student of human nature.

The Little Pilgrim has arrived. "Little Pil." is always sure of a cordial welcome.

We have received a copy of the Sunday School Union Visitor, a neat little semi-monthly, published by C. L. Alford, Hillsdale, Michigan. It is devoted to the advocacy "of Education, Religion, and Morality," in their purity, judging from the large space occupied by Anti-Slavery and Temperance matter. It is only 50 cents per year. C.

Correspondence.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman.

Dear Madam,—A Rev. Gentleman, from Buffalo, called on me, last week, who is a member of the Board of Missions of the Freewill Baptist Denomination in the United States, to enquire into its Mission in Canada, of which the Rev. J. B. Smith is its Missionary, and for which, I am informed, he receives a salary of $500 a-year. That Gentleman is now of the opinion, and I entirely concur in the same, that there is no necessity for such a Mission in Canada,—the $500 paid for it, is as good us thrown away, or at most, it benefits no one but him who receives it. Mr. Smith has no regular missionary station or place to preach at. Most every person, colored or white, forms part either of a membership or congregational connexion with some one of the various Christian denominations in this highly favoured country. Hence it can but be seen, by the most superficial observer, that the field left for Mr. Smith's Missionary labours is very limited; in truth, there is none. I believe he preaches occasionally to some congregations; but if he did not, they would be well supplied by others; and from some of those, I understand, he receives remuneration for such services, in addition to the $500 a-year. If the Freewill Baptist Board of Missions of the States wish to spend five hundred dollars a year, for the improvement of the fugitives in this country, I beg leave to suggest, would it not be better to place it in the hands of a committee of trust-worthy persons, who would distribute it gratis and judiciously for the education of some of the fugitive youths in Canada, and so make them available for the improvement of others. The same rule might be advantageously applied to the large sums already collected, and those being now collected in various places, ostensively for the fugitives; for I am of the opinion it is the only way that it can be of substantial good to them. This opinion coincides with that expressed by the Rev. Gentleman above mentioned. There are plenty of good schools and colleges in this country, accessible to all, only the means is wanting to support them while there.

Another gentleman has called upon me this week also, who informed me that he was sent out from the Old Country by an Association in England, at the head of which is the Right Hon. the Countess of Gainsborough, for educational and missionary purposes. I hope that gentleman and his co-adjutors in their labours of love will not lay down any lines of distinction with regard to complexion in their school and missionary operations; but bring to their assistance as much as possible, the educational facilities already established in this country, in carrying out their benevolent designs.

Yours, &c,

Toronto, Sept. 8, 1854.

To the Editor of the Provincial Freeman:

Dear Madam,—We are continually asking, and very justly too, that we be regarded equal in the eyes of the law; that the proscriptive laws in regard to us should be abolished; that the many and various disabilities under which we labor be removed; and that we may have a fair track to run. This is all very well. But would it not be well, also, for us to remove such disabilities as we can, ourselves? Or, if we cannot remove the burthen from off us, but can get from under it, is not that equal to removing the burthen itself? Perhaps the abrogation of no law would so benefit the colored people of the Northern States or those living in the larger cities, as their removal from those cities to unoccupied lands in the different States; choosing, of course, locations most favorable to them. If there are those who are unwilling to cross the line from the cities of the Eastern and Middle States, a distance of a few hours' ride to Canada, if they will stay this side of a certain line in order to be nearer by, "to help the slave," why not, then, go to the Western States,—Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, &c.?

That the benefits resulting from our removal from cities to the country cannot be over estimated, there cannot be the least doubt, and that the burthen of city life is among the greatest we have to bear, and that it is a matter within our own entire control, is also without a doubt. Still the men who talk most and loudest, about "equal rights, elevation," &c., whether black or white, seldom refer to the subject of our removal to more advantageous positions. The reasons may be that mere theoretical subjects are generally easier to be handled than practical ones, as the former but need to be dressed in eloquent language, while the latter need to be clothed in facts.

Yours, &c.,

Brooklyn, N. Y., Aug. 30th, 1854

Is Ours A Free Country.—A man named Graham was suspected in the interior of Kentucky, of causing a number of slaves to escape into Canada. He managed to escape; if caught summary punishment would have followed, for the planters believed him to be guilty, and that was enough.

A few days ago, Graham, (another man) of Preble county, Ohio, (the inventor of a new and valuable plow) visited Cynthiana while the Court was in session to sell it—Some scoundrel whispered that he was a "negro seducer." This settled the case. Neither his explanations nor remonstrances were heard. Not even his demand for trial, nor to produce witnesses against him or to let him produce witnesses for himself. He was seized by the mob and more than a bushel of eggs thrown upon him.

Nor was this all. The mob blacked his face with indelible ink, except a circle around his eyes, and then ordered him to leave the State as quickly as possible. He arrived in Cincinnati in a most deplorable condition.—Cleve. Leader.

The English loss was 1. French loss trilling. The enemy had 6 killed and 7 wounded. 2,000 prisoners were taken, and are to be sent to France on English ships. Among the prisoners are General Bodisco, the Governor, also Lieutenant-Governor of the Fortress. The Prussian Government insists that negotiations between the Western powers and Russia be submitted to the Diet, but Austria refuses.

The Russian head quarters are at Ismail.

The Austrians have commenced crossing the frontiers of Turin and Swerin.

Arrival of the "Africa."

Engagement between the Russians and Turks.

BREADSTUFFS STEADY.

New York, Sept. 7, 1854.

The Africa, with three days later news, arrived at 7½ a. m.

In flour and wheat no new features.

It is reported at Paris that the Expedition to the Crimea positively left Varna on the 10th.

At the battle of Kars, in Asia, the Russians took 23,000 prisoners, and left 3,000 dead on the field.

The cholera was on the decline at Varna, but was still raging at Adrianople and other places with great violence.

There had been a great fire at Varna, by which one-third of the town was destroyed. The Produce Magazine was saved. The fire was supposed to be the work of Greek incendiarism.

Immediately after the surrender of Bomarsund, Gen. Baraguay D'Hilliers, accompanied by Mr. Grey, Secretary of the English Legation, left for Stockholm, with a view, it is supposed, of urging Sweden to declare for the Western Powers.

The Austrian loan had all been taken.

The French Minister of War has applied to the Sisterhood of St. Vincent de Paul, to act as nurses in the hospitals of the armies in Turkey.

Ralph Randolph Gurley is making an effort to raise $100,000, to be expended in establishing steam communication between the United States and Liberia. The plan has the sanction of leading and wealthy Colonizationists, who hope for aid from the Government, and flatter themselves that nothing but a line of steamers is needed to induce our free coloured population to emigrate to the paradise which has been provided for them. O the power of humbug!—Anti-Slavery Standard.

Fall of a Building.—Last Tuesday, a large granite building, five and a half stories high, in Broad Street, opposite the Court House, in the city of Boston, fell with a tremendous crash. It was occupied by a druggist. There were warning symptoms of the catastrophe, and all the inmates made their escape, excepting a young man, a little boy and a little girl—they were crushed beneath the ruins.

Cheap Travelling.—Some of the steamers, from Detroit to Cleveland, are charging only one shilling, York, for cabin fare, and six pence for a steerage passage.—Prototype.

Diabolical.—Three attempts have been made lately on the Buffalo, Brantford and Goderich Railroad to throw the train off the track. On one occasion a large stump was placed on the rail, when, the engine coming up, split it in twain, and threw it out of the way; in doing this, however, the cow-catcher was smashed up.—St. Catherines Post.

The total number of passengers conveyed on railways in the United Kingdom, in the year 1853, amounted to 102,286,660; the number in 1852, to 89,135,729. The total receipts from all sources of traffic amounted, in 1853 to £18,035,879, and, in 1852, to £15,710,554.

Numbers of active, intelligent young men from the townships surrounding Toronto, especially from Vaughan, are preparing to move to the West to settle on the Crown lands which are now open to the occupation of actual settlers. The price per acre varies from 7s. 6d. to 10s. The soil and climate are good, and promises a rich reward to the industrious pioneer.—North American.

The Counterfeit Radway's Ready Relief in Canada.

THE LIVES OF THE PEOPLE IN DANGER.

THE public are cautioned against purchasing a counterfeit of Radway's Ready Relief, which is now circulating through the Canadas.—We are informed that parties at Hamilton, C.W. have been selling a spurious article of our Ready Relief, for the genuine to dealers. This is not only a fraud upon us, but is a most wicked imposition on the public. The wretch that will knowingly lend himself to so vile and treacherous a trick, for the gain of a few extra sixpences, is unsafe to deal with, and should be shunned by all respectable dealers, for if a few sixpences will induce him to rob the distressed sufferer of hope and health and to place the invalid's life in danger, he would not scruple to deceive his best customers.

Dealers who wish the genuine, purchase only of established credit, not of irresponsible pedlars or travelling adventurers and impostors.

Dealers who have R. R. R. offered to them below our regular price, may rely upon the same being a counterfeit preparation. We never sell R. R. R. in large quantities for less than 10 per cent. from our regular gross price. Dealers who purchase the counterfeit and offer the same for sale, render themselves liable to prosecution.

All of our travellers and authorized Agents have a power of Attorney signed by us, authorizing them in our name, to transact our business.

Poetry.

From the Detroit Free Democrat.

To-Day and To-Morrow.

[The London correspondent of the Spirit of the Times, in speaking of Gerald Massey, a new poet who has just come into favour in that city, says:—

"Another Burns has arisen in the person of Gerald Massey—the poet of labor—one who endeavors to raise the class he sprung from to the enjoyment of the amenities of independence and right—softens it to the enjoyment of domestic comfort; he is full of hope for the people. He should be given to the world in a cheap form, that every one may read him."

The following poem is from the pen of the above writer.]

High hopes that burn'd like stars sublime,
Go down i' the heavens of freedom;
And true hearts perish in the time
We bitterliest need 'em!
But never sit we down and say
There's nothing left but sorrow:
We walk the wilderness to-day,
The promised land to-morrow.

Our birds of song are silent now,
There are no flowers blooming!
Yet life bears in the frozen bough,
And freedom's spring is coming!
And freedom's tide come up alway,
Though we may strand in sorrow:
And our good bark, aground to-day,
Shall float again to-morrow.

Through all the long, dark night of years,
The people's cry ascendeth,
And earth is wet with blood and tears:
But our meek sufferance endeth!
The few shall not forever sway,
The many toil in sorrow,
The powers of hell are strong to-day,
But Christ shall rise to-morrow.

Though hearts brood o'er the past, our eyes
With smiling future glisten!
For, lo! our day bursts up the skies:
Lean out your souls and listen!
The world rolls freedom's radiant way,
And ripens with her sorrow:
Keep heart! who bear the cross to-day,
Shall wear the crown to-morrow.

O youth! flame earnest, still aspire,
With energies immortal!
To many a heaven of desire
Our yearning opes a portal!
And though age wearies by the way,
And hearts break in the furrow,
We'll sow the golden grain to-day—
The Harvest comes to-morrow.

Build up heroic lives, and all
Be like a sheathen sabre,
Ready to flash out at God's call,
O, chivalry of labor!
Triumph and toil are twins: and aye
Joy suns the cloud of sorrow;
And 'tis the martyrdom to-day,
Brings victory to-morrow.

Temperance.

Temperance Fete.

On Monday the south side of the Thames was in a commotion in consequence of an invasion by the whole of the Temperance League, headed by Mr. G. Cruikshank, Mr. Gough, and the other leaders of the movement. The procession was upwards of a mile in length, and included every variety of vehicle, from the smart barouche and four to the humble market cart. Bands of music, banners, &c., were present in abundance, and the destination of the whole was the Surrey Gardens, where the annual fete was to take place. On the arrival of the procession at the gardens the members were addressed at some length by Mr. Gough, the principal topic being the new Temperance Crystal Palace, the prospectus of which has just been issued. Mr. Gough eloquently impressed upon his hearers the expediency of taking shares in the new undertaking, and argued for its success an immence accession of strength to the temperance cause. At the conclusion of the address, which was tremendously cheered, the company separated to enjoy the other amusements of the place, which went off with great eclat, especially the pyrotechnic piece de circonstance which had been especially got up for the occasion.—British Banner.

Rum and War.

The advent of British soldiers and sailors in Constantinople, has introduced some new features in the quaint streets of that oriental city. Among other things, English signs are constantly going up, not a few of which are amusingly Anglican. For instance, the sign "Grog Shop," actually painted out in full, may be seen over many doors. A correspondent of the Traveller thus refers to another curious sign in Galata:

I was most amused, however, with a somewhat ambitious looking sign I saw in Galata, upon which was written, verbatim et literatim, "Wines and spirits sold here, and divers kinds of Trunks." At first I wondered what connection there might be between the sale of 'trunks' and that of spirits, but soon my mind was enlightened on that point. The man who wrote the sentence was no Englishman, but probably a German, and it was intended to be "Divers kinds of drunks," (of course for 'drinks.') But how indisputably true! Wherever wines and spirits are sold, there are also sold 'divers kinds of drunks!'—Would that such miserable establishments might not follow in the train of British soldiers and sailors! The well known propensities of many of this class, however, hold out every inducement to the rum-seller to be always within call.—Ex. Paper.

Social Reform.

The Edinburgh Review, for July, has an article on Teetotalism and the Maine Liquor Law, principally occupied with the history of the legislative proceedings relating to the liquor trade in different States of the American Union, and the evidence which has been collected of the effect of this legislation upon the community. The writer is favorable to the suppression of intemperance by the law, but he remarks:

One caution, however, we will add. The working classes are now attracted to the tippling house by finding there (what they never find at home) both comfort and amusement; in the shape of well lighted rooms, newspapers, and social intercourse. Now all these things might be supplied without ale or gin. We would, therefore, urge upon the benevolent agitators who seek to suppress the ale-house and the gin places, the necessity of providing the poor with public reading rooms and coffee-houses, free libraries and museums, cheap concerts and exhibitons for winter seasons; and open parks, zoological gardens, and cricket grounds for summer. If, in the petitions for restrictive legislation, which they are now preparing, they would incorporate proposals for innocent recreation to the people, they would obtain a far more extensive support from those whom they desire to benefit, but who now too often regard all enactments tending to the promotion of public morality as the tyrannical interference of the rich with the amusements of the poor.—Olive Branch.

Operation of the New Liquor Law in Connecticut.

Two or three arrests under the new Liquor Law have been made in this city for drunkenness. One man, arrested last night, was put over the road to the tune of twenty dollars and costs. A Mrs. Lisbon was arrested yesterday for dealing the beverage to her customers, and in consequence of failure to deposit $20 in the Town Treasury, stands committed. Two seizures of liquor occurred yesterday. One Hugh Goodwin, an Irishman, and a Mrs. Andrew Mead, were the former proprietors of the "crathur," which now safely reposes under the argus eye of the law. When some forty bottles of porter were being taken from the premises of Goodwin, corner of Morocco Street and Congress Avenue, he very innocently remarked, that they were stored for the use of a sick child just wained, and that it was cruel to remove it under the circumstances!—New Haven Palladium.

Gerrit Smith.

In his address to consituents, on resigning his seat in Congress, Gerrit Smith says:

1. Some members of Congress are, either from age or other causes, too feeble to be compelled, unless in a case of absolute necessity, to leave their beds at such an unusual hour for leaving them.—2. At this sleepy hour few persons are in a state for the wise and safe transaction of important business. 3. As the friend of temperance, both my lips and example shall ever testify against any night-session of Congress, that is not called for by the clearest necessity. What if the majority had appointed the taking of the vote on the Nebraska question in a dram shop? Would you have had me present? I trust not. But, are you yet to learn that the scenes of Congress do not differ always in all respects from the scenes of a dram shop! I was present a part of the night-session, in which the final vote on the Nebraska Bill was taken; and I was convinced that Congress should avoid all unnecessary night-session, until Congress loves temperance more, and rum less. Never did I witness more gross drunkenness than I did on that occasion. I had to remain until 11 o'clock—for I had to remain and record my vote against the Pro-Slavery Bill. After that I hurried away, full of shame and sorrow. It so happened that Lord Elgin, the Governor of Canada, sat by my side for an hour or more, during that evening of sad recollections. The drunkenness was perceived by him as well as by myself. I might rather say, it glared upon his observation, as well as upon my own. It was certainly, very polite and kind in him to tell me, as he did, in the course of our conversation respecting this disgraceful scene, that he had witnessed shameful disorder in the British Parliament. Nevertheless, his politeness and kindness did not relieve me of my deep mortification.

A Governor Caught.—Gov. Gorman is ex-officio Indian Agent for the Minnesota Indians. At a recent council with the Chippewas, the Governor threatened the Indians with the loss of their annuity if found drunk, and any Indian's portion thus forfeited was to be divided equally among the sober. Hole-in-the-dark, a distinguished orator remarked in reply, that it was just, but that the same rule ought to be applied to the agent, who was a great man, and had a great annuity. It ought to be taken from him and divided, like the others, for he got drunk very often. The Governor must have felt rather streaked about that time.—Indianapolis Journal.

Constitution of the Provincial Union.

Article I.

We, the undersigned, associate for the purpose of carrying out the following Pledge:—

Believing in the necessity of measures to further promote literature, general intelligence, active benevolence, the principles of universal freedom, and a British union not based on complexional considerations, and in the imperative duty now resting upon us to thwart the plans now maturing to array one class of Her Majesty's subjects against another, and increasing class, on the grounds of the complexional characteristics and origin of the latter, we pledge ourselves to do all in our power in our associated capacity, as Members of this Union, and in our private capacity, as citizens,—1st: To promote a healthy harmony, and to diffuse a loyal spirit among those of Her Majesty's subjects with whom we may associate, or come in contact. 2nd. To encourage and support a Press, or those Presses, in Canada, which will stand on the watch-tower to notify the citizens of this country against the unjust imputations, reflections and designs of many in the United States and this country, who would carve out a policy for emigrants, formerly bond, and free, different from white emigrants who may and do settle herein, by counselling the former to be a "good peasantry" for the latter as their highest ambition; or to aggregate themselves into exclusive communities, or to look upon the West Indies as the home for the mass, in preference to the free soil of Canada; thereby promulgating the dangerous doctrine that God's children, of different complexions, cannot live together under the protection of the British Lion, in British America, unless those of darker hue, become "hewers of wood and drawers of water" to those of white complexion. 3rd. To do all in our power to remove the stain of Slavery from the face of the earth, and particularly, as subjects of Great Britain, to check its progress in America by all legitimate means; and, 5th. To encourage the rising generation in literary, scientific, and mechanical efforts. 6th. As a nucleus of operations, to support the "Provincial Freeman," as our organ, so long as it may be found to advocate sound principles, and to use our ability to promote objects in connexion with it, to further honest endeavours in this direction.

Article II.

For the better success of the above measures, the Parent Society shall consist of a President, a Vice-President, Recording and Corresponding Secretaries, Treasurer, and a Committee as extensive as the number o signatures to the Pledge.

Article III.

The annual fee of each male member shall be 2s. 6d. c'y.

Article. IV.

The Female Members shall organize a Committee, with a Moderator, Secretary and Treasurer; and the annual contribution for each member, shall be 1s. 3d.

Article V.

The object of the Ladies' Committee shall be to prepare articles for an Annual Fair, to be held in Toronto, Hamilton, London, Chatham and other large cities and towns, at which auxiliaries may be formed; also, to devise other measures for promoting the specific object; namely, the support of the people's organ, the Provincial Freeman.

Article VI.

Auxiliary Societies may be formed in each town, city, or village, in which parties may be found to take as their basis the Constitution of this Society, provided that they, at their option, make such local arrangements as the peculiarities of the case require.

Article VII.

The officers of this Society shall be elected annually, and at each annual meeting, one or more persons shall be empowered to assist in forming auxiliaries, and in whatever way the interests of the Society may demand.

Article VIII.

The Ladies' Committee shall meet every Monday evening, for the purpose of making up articles, useful and elegant; and to them shall be entrusted the details of their plans.

Article IX.

A monthly meeting of members, both male and female, shall be assembled for the purpose of promoting the literary objects specified by recitations of original pieces, reading, debates, &c. Twice in the year at the semi-annual and annual meetings parties shall be solicited to address the Society.

Article X.

This Constitution can be altered at the Annual Meeting, by a vote of a majority of members present, and the addition of the votes from each auxiliary society, through delegates from the same, provided, that at whatever place the Annual Fair may be held, the Annual Meeting shall be held for the time being.

FUGITIVE SLAVES IN CANADA.

A degree of attention has of late been directed to the condition of the Fugitive Slaves resident in Canada, but comparatively little information concerning them has reached the public. The presence in this country of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, who has been delegated by the Anti-Slavery Society of Canada to make the case of these Refugees more generally known, has caused a number of Gentlemen to form a Committee, for the purpose of raising a fund to afford them temporary relief, on their arrival in Canada, from the scene of their bondage.

The entire number of Fugitives in Canada may be estimated at from thirty thousand to thirty-five thousand, of whom from three to five thousand have annually escaped since the passing of the Fugitive Slave Law. On their arrival at Toronto, and other places along the Canadian frontier, that is, along a boundary of some seven hundred miles, they are usually destitute of every thing, having generally fled stealthily, and without making much preparation for flight. They undergo numerous privations on their painful and wearisome journey, being in constant peril by the way, not only through the Slave States, but through the Northern, or nominally free. At any point, if overtaken, or discovered, or even suspected, they may be dragged before the Courts, and, upon a most summary process, sent back to endure a bondage of which the ordinary rigours are always increased in the case of Fugitives, to operate as a warning to others. Hence, during their flight, they are in a constant state of suspense, fear, and excitement; and when they reach the Canadian frontier, usually fall into a condition of bodily and mental prostration, which renders them incapable of immediate efforts, and makes them objects of compassionate interest.

Being strangers, destitute of the commonest necessaries, and in some instances, suffering from temporary illness and over fatigue, they require a helping hand. The Anti-Slavery Society of Canada, and a Ladies' Society at Toronto, provide these Refugees with food, clothing, tools, or whatever they require, until they procure employment and can support themselves. This necessarily entails a very considerable expenditure, which these Societies are not in a position to meet to the extent to which their aid is needed.

It is not only an interesting fact, but one which should be emphatically dwelt upon, that the Refugee Fugitives require only temporary assistance. Labour of every kind is in great demand, and the Society being kept duly informed of the parties who are in want of labourers, they seldom fail to procure employment on advantageous terms. In no instance within the last year and a half has the Society been called upon to extend relief for more than six days, except in cases of sickness. The fund sought to be raised is therefore not intended to be set aside to maintain able-bodied men in idleness for an indefinite period, but to enable the Canadian Society to respond to the large claims made upon it, to supply the more immediate and pressing demands of the Fugitives on their arrival, and until they have sufficiently recovered from fatigue to avail themselves of the advantages of abundant employment and food, good wages, cheap land, equal liberty, and impartial laws, and the privileges and rights which are common to other classes of Canadians.

Canada being the nearest of the British Colonies to the United States, (the stronghold of Slavery) it is of no small importance to encourage the improvement and elevation of these negro refugees, because of the influence, direct and reflex, which would thereby be brought to bear upon American Slavery. The black settlers of Canada are nearly all of them fugitives from slavery. Their improvement would be a triumphant rebuke to those who once held them as chattles, and to those who hold that the slave requires to be prepared for freedom; for they would exhibit the spectacle of a people just escaped from the galling yoke competing as free men, successfully and honourably with other labour. Further, as there exist in Canada some of the prejudices against colour, and as the progressive improvement of the coloured population is gradually undermining and destroying this feeling, their improvement affords a practical demonstration, not only of the equal capacity of the negro for self-advancement where he has a proper incentive to labour, but of the unreasonableness of the prejudice against him. Lastly, his social elevation by his own industry and enterprise, is even now triumphantly proving the fitness of the slave for freedom, the righteousness and the practicability of immediate emancipation, (in so far as the slaves themselves are concerned) and the perfect capability of the negro to live and to advance under the same government and upon terms of political and social equality with the Anglo-Saxon raise, or any other of the one great human family.

At a large and respectable meeting held in Freemason's Hall the Right Hon. the Earl of Shaftesbury in the Chair,—after an Address from Rev. S. R. Ward, showing the condition of the Fugitive Slaves in Canada and stating their need of temporary aid immediately upon their arrival in that Colony.—it was proposed by the Rev. C. B Grimes, of St. Paul's East Smithfield, and seconded by the Rev. Thomas James, Secretary to the Colonial Missionary Society, and adopted:

"That having heard the statement of the Rev. Samuel Ringold Ward, respecting the destitution of the Fugitive Slaves on thier arrival in Canada after affecting their escape from the United States; and, feeling that under such circumstances they have a claim on our sympathy, and need temporary assistance, this Meeting cordially approves of the object of the mission, and pledges itself to promote it; and that for carrying out of the same the following Gentlemen be the Officers and Committee, with power to add to their number

Constitution of the National Council.

For the purpose of improving the character, developing the intelligence, maintaining the rights and organizing a Union of the Colored People of the Free States, the National Convention does hereby ordain and institute the

"NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE COLORED PEOPLE."

Art. 1. This Council shall consist of two members from each State, represented in this Convention, to be elected by this Convention, and two other members from each State to be elected as follows: On the 15th day of November next, and biennially thereafter, there shall be held in each State, a Poll, at which each colored inhabitant may vote who pays ten cents as poll-tax, and each State shall elect, at such election, such delegates to State Legislatures, twenty in number from each State, at large. The election to be held at such places and under such conditions as the public meetings in such localities may determine. The members of the National Council in each State, shall receive, canvass, and declare the result of such vote. The State Council, thus elected, shall meet on the first Monday in January, 1854, and elect additional members to the National Council, in proportion of one to five thousand of the colored population of such State; and the members of council thus elected, to take office on the sixth day of July next, and all to hold office during two years from that date; at the end of which time another general election by State council shall take place of members to constitute their successors in office, in the same numbers as above. The State council of each State shall have full power over the internal concerns of said State.

Art. 2. The members of the first council shall be elected by this convention, which shall designate out of the number, a President, a Vice-President, Secretary, Treasurer, corresponding Secretary, and committee of five on Manual Labor—a committee of five on Protective Unions—of five on Publications.

Art. 3. The committee on Manual Labor School shall procure funds and organize said School in accordance with the plans adopted by this National Convention, with such modifications as experience or necessity may dictate to them. The committee shall immediately incorporate itself as an academy under "The General Committee of the State of——," and shall constitute the Board of Trustees of the Manual Labor School, with full power to select a location in the State designated by the National council, to erect buildings, appoint or dismiss instructers in the literary or mechanical branches. There shall be a farm attached to the School.

Art. 4. The committee on Protective Unions shall institute a Protective Union for the purchase and sale of articles of domestic consumption, and shall unite and aid in the formation of branches anxiliary to their own.

Art. 5. The committee on Business Relations, shall establish an office, in which they shall keep a registry of colored mechanics, artizans and business men throughout the Union. They shall keep a registry of all persons willing to employ colored men in business, to teach colored boys mechanical trades, liberal and scientific professions, and farming; and also, a registry of colored men and boys seeking employment or instruction. They shall also report upon any avenues of business or trade which they deem inviting to colored capital, skill, or labor. Their reports and advertisements to be in papers of the widest circulation. They shall receive for sale or exhibition, products of the skill and labor of colored people.

Art. 6. The committee on Publication shall collect all facts, statistics and statements, all laws and historical records and biographies of the colored people, and all books by colored authors. They shall have for the safe keeping of these documents, a Library, with a Reading Room and Museum. The committee shall also publish replies to any assaults, worthy of note, made upon the character or condition of the colored People.

Art. 7. Each committee shall have absolute control over its special department; shall make its own by-laws, and in case of any vacancy occurring, shall fill up the same forthwith subject to the confirmation of the council. Each committee shall meet at least once a month or as often as possible; shall keep a minute of all its proceedings, executive and financial, and shall submit a full statement of the same, with the accounts audited, at every regular meeting of the National council.

Art. 8. The National council shall meet at least once in six months, to receive the reports of the committees, and to consider any new plan for the general good, for which it shall have power, at its option, to appoint a new committee, and shall be empowered to receive and appropriate donations for the carrying out of the objects of the same. At all such meetings, eleven members shall constitute a quorum. In case any committee neglect or refuse to send in its report, according to article 8th, then the council shall have power to enter the bureau, examine the books and papers of such committee; and in case the committee shall persist in its refusal or neglect, then the council shall declare their offices vacant, and appoint others in their stead.

Art. 9. In all cases of the meetings of the National Council, or the committees, the traveling expenses (if any) of the members shall be paid out of the respective funds.

Art. 10. The council shall immediately establish a bureau in the place of its meeting: and the same rooms shall, as far as possible, be used by the several committees for their various purposes. The council shall have a clerk, at a moderate salary, who will keep a record of their transactions, and prepare a condensed report of the committees for publication; and, also, a registry of the friends of the cause.

Art. 11. The expenses of the council shall be defrayed by the fees of membership of subsocieties or councils, to be organised throughout the States. The membership fee shall be one cent per week,

Art. 14. The council shall have power to make such Bye-Laws as are necessary for their proper government.

The following resolutions, having a direct bearing upon the plan of organization were adopted by the Convention and are therefore appended to the Council's Constitution.]

Resolved That the Council shall be delegated to select its various Committees.

Resolved, That the Council shall have power to offer a premium for prize essays on different subjects agreed on by Council.

Resolved, That the said Council shall hear and grant petitions and be governed by the rules of legislative bodies, and their decisions shall be final.

Resolved, That any State applying for admission into this Union, shall be admitted on such terms, as may hereafter be agreed upon.

Resolved, That in establishing a National Council for our own special improvement, and a Manual Labor School for the education of our children in science, literature and mechanical arts, this Convention do this, not to build ourselves up as a distinct and separate class in this country, but as a means to a great end, viz: the equality in political rights, and in civil and social privileges with the est of the American people.

PLAN OF THE AMERICAN INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL.

The undersigned, the Committee on Manual Labour School, appointed by the National Council of the colored people, in offering a plan for the organization of the school, beg leave to state,

1st. JERUSALEM.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

Fair shines the moon, Jerusalem!
Upon the hills that wore
The glory once, their diadem,
Ere Judah's reign was o'er;
The stars on hallowed Olivet,
And over Zion burn,
But when shall rise, thy spendor set?
Thy majesty return?

The peaceful shades that wrap thee now
Thy desolation hide;
The moonlit beauty of thy brow
Restores thine ancient pride;
Yet there, where Rome thy Temple rent,
The dews of midnight wet
The marble dome of Omar's tent,
And Aksa's minaret.

Thy strength, Jerusalem, is o'er,
And broken are thy walls;
The harp of Israel sounds no more
In thy deserted halls.
But where thy Kings and Prophets trod,
Triumphant over Death,
Behold! the living soul of God—
The Christ of Nazareth!

The halo of his presence fills
Thy courts, thy ways of men;
His footsteps on thy holy hills
Are beautiful as then;
The prayer, whose bloody sweat betrayed
His human agony,
Still haunts the awful olive shade
Of old Gethsemane.

Woe unto thee, Jerusalem!
Slayer of Prophets thou,
That in thy fury stonest them
God sent, and sends thee now;—
Where thou, O Christ! with anguish spent,
Forgave thy foes, and died,
Thy garments yet are daily rent—
Thy souls is crucified!

They darken with the Christian name
The light that from thee beamed,
And by the hatred they proclaim
Thy spirit is blasphemed;
Unto thine ear the prayers they send
Were fit for Belial's reign,
And Moslem scimitars defend
The temple they profane.

Who shall rebuild Jerusalem?
Her scattered children bring
From Earth's far ends, and gather them
Beneath her shelting wing?
For Judah's sceptre broken lies,
And from his kingly stem
No new Messiah shall arise
For lost Jerusalem!

But let the wild ass on her hills
Its foal unfreighted lead,
And by the source of Kedron's rills
The desert adder breed;
For where the love of Christ has made
Its mansion in the heart,
He builds in pomp that will not fade,
Her heavenly counterpart.

How long, O Christ! shall men obscure
Thy holy charity—
How long the godless rites endure,
Which they bestow on thee?
Thou in whose soul of tenderness
The Father's mercy shone,
Who came, the sons of men to bless
By Truth and Love alone.

The suns of eighteen hundred years
Have seen thy reign expand,
And Morning, on her pathway, hears
Thy name in every land;
But where thy sacred steps were sent
The Father's will to bide,
Thy garments yet are daily rent—
Thy soul is crucified!

Literature.

Reason and Instinct.

BY C. W. ROGERS, M.D.

Reason is that faculty of the human mind which intentionally adapts means to ends, with a knowledge or belief, on the part of the actor, that the means employed will produce the ends desired.

As there are very many at the present day who affect to consider Reason and Instinct as attributes the same in kind, but differing in degree, I shall proceed to point out the distinctions embodied in the two terms, and endeavor to controvert an opinion so subversive of the dignity and exaltation of man—an opinion which, in the language of another, is the offspring of "that debasing philosophy, so common at this day, that looks upon man as little more than a somewhat improved orang."

"An instinct," says Paley, "is a propensity prior to experience, and independent of instruction;" and to render the distinction between it and reason still more apparent, we may further define it as the unintentional adaptation of means to ends, without a knowledge or belief on the part of the animal, that the means employed will produce the ends desired. Those sentient powers constituting the spirit, the essence of the brute, whose spontaneous and unvarying manifestations we designate Instinct, and which act from within, are perfectly harmonious in design and accomplishment with those powers whose known activities we characterize as Natural Laws, and which act from without upon the brute; consequently, the brute, endowed with a feeble will, morally unaccountable, wholly unimaginative, and but partially reflective, lives strictly in accordance with the law within and with the law without, and neither does nor can do violence to one, the other, or to both these laws. From this negative character of his psychical endowments, the integrity or continuance of his life depends solely upon the co-ordinate and consentaneous activity of these two classes of powers, and both these classes being perfect in character, limited in extent and intensity, and in no wise conflicting with the laws of his mental organization, the brute continues in existence until the end of his creation has been accomplished, and then, if undomesticated, sinks into oblivion by a gradual and painless decay.

There is a sacred character to that mysterious something we call Life, which leads the most brutal of men to hold it in reverent regard, partly because its mystery is profoundly inexplicable, its origin involved in darkness, its problem unsolved, and apparently insoluble, its extinction a sinking into vacant obscurity, and the consequences of this extinction calamitous to its earthly embodiment; and partly because its very mystery would seem to declare it an undying principle, capable of a progressive development from high to higher, and created by an all-wise Father for spontaneous and unending happiness. Hence, we find that men in all ages have ascribed to brutes an immortal soul, and have considered their acts of instinctive reason as the results of a remembered faculty once their own in the past, or as a prescience of a nobler development to become their own in the future.

This deep respect for the sanctity of life, and this opinion of undying nature of its essence, have become the heir-looms of modern science; and we now find a belief in the existence of the souls of beasts a prominent clause in the creeds of the philosopher and natural historian. Says Prichard, with a depth of reverent feeling which must command the respect of all, "It is difficult to discover a valid argument that limits the possession of an immaterial principle to man. The phenomena of feeling, of desire, and aversion, of love and hatred, of fear and revenge, and the perception of external relations manifested in the life of brutes, imply, not only through the analogy which they display to the human faculties, but likewise from all that we can learn or conjecture of their particular nature, the superadded existence of a principle distinct from the mere mechanism of materiel bodies." Here, then, in man's own spiritual nature, is the foundation of the opinion that Reason is but Instinct of a larger growth. He began by ascribing a soul to the brute; how, then, could he deny to it the lesser attribute of reason?

But to return from this digression.

"There is a series of anatomical facts connected with this subject which seem to demonstrate that instinct is, in its essential nature, a different principle from reason. By comparing the faculties of different animals, we find that these two powers generally exist in a kind of inverse ratio to each other; the more perfectly organized animals possessing a larger share of reason, and those that are less so being more directed by instinct. Now, by observing the nervous systems of these animals respectively, we find that there is a gradation in the comparative size of the brain and nerves which corresponds to the state of their faculties In man, where reason exists in the greatest degree, and where instinct holds a subordidate place, the brain is the largest in comparison with the rest of the nervous system. In quadrupeds and birds the size of the brain decreases, while that of the spinal marrow and nerves increases; this comparative scale goes on through the amphibia and fish until we arrive at some of the insect tribes, which, although they possess a variety of organs and many elaborate functions, yet have very small and imperfect brains. And we observe that the faculties of reason and instinct bear a respective ratio to the comparative size of the brain and nerves. In quadrupeds we have decisive proof of the operation of instinct, although still with an evident portion of reason; in cold-blooded animals instinct very greatly predominates, and to this faculty we shall probably, upon mature reflection, refer many of the varied operations of insect tribes, their variety and perfection depending rather upon the variety and perfection of their organs of sense and motion than upon the nature of the principle which directs their actions."—Bostock's Syst. Phys., pp. 766, 767.

Many of the instinctive actions of the lower animals we may, therefore, regard as automatic, and not voluntary; since they are performed, not by the will acting through the medium of the brain and nervous system, but by the reflex action of the sensory ganglia responding to sensations excited by external or internal impressions. Here, then, is an explanation of the marvellous ability of birds and insects to remain for hours in the continued exercise of their organs of locomotion, being excited thereto either by the promptings of hunger, or of some other vague want of their natures, which seeks its own satisfaction by these long-continued exertions, which are as little fatiguing to them as are the consensual movements of our eyes and eyeslids to us.

But while the attribute of Reason is a characteristic of the mind of man alone, it is not possessed in an equal degree of power by all men. In this respect it differs widely from the instinct of animals, which are equally powerful in all members of the same species. The beaver builds his dam, and the bee and the wasp their nests and cells, in the same manner, of the same materials, and with the same readiness and skill that the first created beavers, bees, and wasps used and exercised when they first essayed to do the bidding of the blind impulses within. In all the time elapsing from their creation to the present day, they have improved in no respect, and the first attempt of the young is as perfect and as speedy in its accomplishment as the last attempt of its most aged living progenitor. Hence, we may infer that the Instinct of the brute is perfect and unimprovable, while the Reason of man is imperfect, and indefinitely improvable.

There is reason to believe that the means and improvements observable in the mentality of animals have been excited in them by the stimulous of the presence of man, (who is to them, as Bacon has observed, "instead of a God, or melior natural,") in accordance with and adaptiveness impressed upon them, ab initio, by the Creator, in order that they might be the more serviceable to man in their various subordinate capacities. But while we accord Reason to man and Instinct to the brute, we cannot but acknowledge that each is governed, to a measured extent, by the attribute of the other, As the instincts preside over the animal functions, which have for their object the preservation of the individual and continuance of the species, they are powerful in the brute, whose life is mere animation, and predominate over that small spark of reason which domestication or the fear of man has enkindled within. With man, however, the preservation of life, and the continuance of the species, are of secondary importance, as compared with that moral and intellectual advancement which is alone to solve the problem of his existence. But as all men have not an equal capacity for advancement in moral and intellectual strength, as they are not all equally human in the possession of this great attribute, reason, we furnish the occasion and the proof of the poet's lines:—

"Our little lives are kept in equipoise
By opposite attractions and desires:
The struggle of the instinct that enjoys,
And the more noble instinct that inspires."

From a consideration of these facts and arguments, we say that the lower orders of creation are, in their highest psychical manifestations, governed by instinctive reason, while we accord to man also a submission to the supremacy of Reason.

Having established one point, let us return to a closer consideration of our subject.

An act of reason consists essential in observation, comparison, and reflection.

It is evident that observation must be the first step in reasoning, since the mind must be supplied with images, or personified ideas, before it can act inductively. The ideas thus gained form the basis of general language, or the language of observation. Observation furnishes us with a knowledge of the qualities of objects, and the consideration of these qualities leads us to a knowledge of the abstract, the essential. In order to comprehend and to enlarge this latter knowledge, the mind must be under the dominance of a controlling will, which, by closing the avenues of sense, will enable it to acquire the power of acting from notions, instead of from mere images. Without this power thus gained by a systematic training or education, the mind cannot long act upon the abstract without returning at short intervals to rest upon the concrete.

Before material things can be acted upon by our minds, they must come within the range of our senses, in order that we may take cognizance of their properties, and learn of their reality by comparison. Thus with ideas. No matter how abstruse, subtle, or immaterial they in their nature may be, they must still be presented in such a manner that the mind is able to perceive in them that relation to the material or to other ideas of the abstract, which will bring them within its comprehension by comparison, or they remain for ever dormant, or so faintly shadowed within as to elude the grasp, and defy the powers of expression.

But while the great basis of our knowledge thus rests upon observation and comparison, its superstructure may safely be said to be reared by reflection. As in paintings by the old masters, long-continued study alone enables us to perceive their beauties, to catch all their inspiration, and to conceive all their suggestions: so in the works by the Divine Master, that repeated mental observation and comparison which constitutes reflection, coupled with an ability for long-continued and protracted abstraction, will alone enable us to perceive the truth which underlies all our knowledge, to look beyond the thing that seems to that which is, to look through nature up to nature's God. While there is this intimate connection between perception and reason, the former may exist as the only attribute of an individual mind, though, from the nature of the latter, the converse cannot be true. As an instance of the perceptive powers possessed in their highest degree of activity and strength, unaccompanied by any trace of the reasoning faculty, we may instance the daughter of Addison, the celebrated English essayist of the last century. So perfect were her powers of observation and retention, that nothing escaped either, and yet she was a perfect idiot, incapable of tracing the least connection between the most apparent cause and its most simple and obvious effect.

Instances are very numerous of the possession of the faculty of reason, or, in this connection, of abstract thought, greater in activity than the accompanying perceptive powers; but no instances are on record in which the former were perfect in their action while the latter were either remarkably deficient or wholly wanting; and for an obvious reason: it would be impossible to adapt means to ends, to compare facts with each other, or mental impressions with external things, or to induce inferences from facts, or to perform such other offices as fall within the province of reason, without the ability to perceive the means, to notice and collect the facts, and to observe those external things whereby originate our mental impressions. Hence we perceive the necessity of an equal balance between the powers of observation and reflection, since only that man's mind is well balanced, and his ability to reason the most perfect, whose perceptive and reasoning powers are relatively equal in size, strength, and activity, so that observation is instantaneous, reasoning is quick and certain, and the results speedily attained and instantly practicable.

The Drunkard's Child.

Did you ever see a drunkard's child? He knows no comforts; home has no charms for him, for there is no one to care for him there, no one to sympathise with him; no heart to beat in harmony with his; nothing but curses, quarrels, and discords; bereft of everything that could stimulate morality, or elevate the youthful aspirations of that child. Can he be good? Can he glorify his Maker by an upright and consistant life? Can he possibly be anything but a drunkard's child? With him the present is dark and comfortless; this world has no charms for him, and the future is still more dreary. No! there is no hope; he is and must be a drunkard's child. His parents' example is either stamped on his mind as right, or his mind is so biassed by constant intercourse with intemperance, that the evil is divested of its horrors. His passions begin to develop themselves; and under such tutorage, aided by the power of Satan, how can he but be lost? What hope for him? The power of rumsellers on earth, and of Satan from Hell, are combined to drag that poor child down to regions of darkness.

These, sir, are some of my thoughts, when I meet, as I often do, a drunkard's child. O, if intemperance extended no further than to those who drink the fiery poisons—if it did not hand down diseased constitutions, and thus fasten its deadly fangs upon the children, subjecting them, for the fathers' sin, to a life of misery, suffering, and pain, then it could almost be endured. But it stops not till having piled the sod upon the parents' grave, it sends forth the children to feed on inherited vices, or to be confined to a prison home, or it may be an alms-house or hospital to die.

I once had a poor sick child under my care. The physician, after mature examination, pronounced his disease to be the result of parental drunkenness and debauchery. O, what an inheritance for the poor child! Disease, suffering, death. The sleepless hours of night, passed with that sick child, made me often wish and offer a fervent prayer to God that we might have a Prohibitory Liquor Law.

I never meet one of those children of the Drunkard, but I want to take him to the nearest rum seller, and showing the sorrow-stricken child as a witness that will appear against him before the Great Tribunal in the settlement of his final account, plead with him for the sake of suffering humanity to stop his work of iniquity and death. But they are deaf to all such entreaties, and dead to all remonstrances, giving fearful evidence that they are in league with the fiends of darkness. Thank heaven, however, that their work is nearly done, for the Maine Law is soon to be the Main Law for this city and the world.—N. Y. Alliance.

Wine Drinking in Italy.

In regard to temperance I am inclined to think that the inhabitants of Southern Italy, and of the wine growing countries generally, enjoy a reputation beyond their deserts. It is true that it is very rare to see a man absolutely drunk, but it is not uncommon to see those who have drank more than is good for them. But even when excess is avoided, the constant use of wine in considerable quantities, is unfavourable both to health and good morals; to health from the febrile and inflammatory state of the system to which it leads, and to good morals from the irritability of temper and quarrelsome spirit which it induces. If the proportion of cases of stabbing brought to the Roman hospitals, which occur in or near wine-shops, could be known, I have no question it would furnish a strong fact wherewith to point the exhortations of the temperance lecturer. There is an added temptation to drink abundantly of wine, from the nature of the usual food of the common people. This being principally vegetable, does not, especially in cold weather, supply waste of nervous energy, but leaves, even when the appetite is satisfied, a certain dull and indefinable craving, like being filled but not fed. Wine relieves this sense of flatness and inertness by the momentary glow and fillip it gives to the languid blood; but the relief thus derived is like the heat of a fire of thorns, and there is thus a constant inducement to repeat and increase the remedy. If the common people of Rome and its neighbourhood would eat more meat, and drink less wine, there is little question that their health and morals would be the better for the change.—Hillard's six months in Italy

A Short Story.

Dickens tells the following story of an American sea-captain:—

In his last voyage home, the captain had on board a young lady of remarkable personal attractions—a phrase I use as being one entirely new, and you never meet with in the newspapers. This young lady was beloved intensely by five young gentlemen, passengers, and in turn she was in love with them all very ardently, but without any particular preference for either.

Not knowing how to make up her determination in this dilemma, she consulted my friend the captain. The captain being a man of original turn of mind, says to the young lady, "jump overboard, and marry the man that jumps after you." The young lady struck with the idea, and being fond of bathing, especially in warm weather, as it then was, took the advice of the captain, who had a boat ready and manned, in case of accident.

Accordingly, the next morning, the five lovers being on deck, and looking very devotedly at the young lady, she plunged into the sea, head foremost. Four of the lovers immediately jumped in after her. When the young lady and her four lovers got out again, she says to the captain, "what am I to do now, they are so wet?" Says the captain, "Take the dry one!" And the young lady did, and married him.

The Nutmeg Tree.

This tree is found in great perfection at Bird's Valley and El Dorado Canon. Trees are found here from eighteen to twenty-four inches in diameter, and full of the fruit, which is contained in a covering like the coating of the English walnut. Before ripe it is soft and quite stringent; but when mature, the covering opens and the nutmeg drops. The berry or nut ripens at various periods. Upon the same tree may be seen ripe and green fruit. The ripe nutmeg is of the same form, and is as fully aromatic as the fruit of Sumatra. The foliage is like the pine or the hemlock, each leaf having, however, a sharp briar or thorn upon it. The fruit grows in clusters, similar to the cherry, and is indeed quite ornamental.

The Greatest Steamer in the World.

The immense screw and paddle steamer, building by Scott Russel, at Millwall, England, for the Eastern Steam Navigation Company, is to be completed in twelve months. Her keel has been laid down, and several of her bulkheads, or compartments, are raised, and the works are proceeding with energy and expedition. A railroad has been laid down the entire length of her way, to facilitate the conveyance of the materials from the factory to the different parts of the vessel. The exact dimensions of the ship are as follows: Tonnage, builder's measurement, 22,000 tons; tonnage burden, 10,000 tons; extreme length, 680 feet; extreme breadth, 83 feet; extreme depths, 58 feet; power of engines, (screw paddle,) 2,600 horse. Her engines are in the course of construction, and will be fitted in the vessel before she is floated off. The hull will be entirely of iron, and of more than usual strength; the magnitude of her size enabling Mr. Brunel, the architect, to introduce many precautionary measures conducive to support and security. From her keel up to six feet above the water line is double, of a cellar construction. The upper deck will also be strengthened on the same principle, and will form a complete beam, similar to the tube of the Britannia Bridge, so that any external injury will not affect the tightness or the safety of the ship. She is divided into ten separate water-tight compartments, each being 60 feet in length, enabling her to take out sufficient fuel for a voyage to Australia and back to England without stopping.

The Value of Freedom.

The city article of the Times informs us, one day last week, that

"One of the largest diamonds known was deposited yesterday at the BANK of England, by a London house, to whom it was consigned from Rio Janeiro. Its weight is 254 carats, and its estimated value, according to the scale, £280,000. It is said to be of the finest water, and without flaw, and was found by a negro slave, who received his freedom as a reward."

Freedom is, we know, beyond all price, and we can scarcely be surprised at its having been changed at the comparatively moderate sum of £280,000 to a negro in Rio Janeiro. Nevertheless, as an article is worth only what it will fetch, and as slaves are to be had for a few pounds, we can hardly see the principle on which a negro who had found property worth £280,000 should have been mulcted of the whole, and then presented with that which he might have purchased any day for less than a two-thousandth part of the sum alluded to. The negro is, perhaps, perfectly satisfied. But we fancy that if we had fallen in with such a valuable "find," we should hardly have been content if somebody had walked up, taken possession of our treasure, and then informed us we were at liberty to go wherever we thought proper. It is evident that they manage these things in Rio Janeirio more summarily, if not altogether better, than in England.—Punch.

Fox and Pit.

Mr. Fox was totally unlike his great rival. Pitt was stately, taciturn, and of an austere temper, Fox was easy, social, and of a kindly disposition. Pitt was tall and grave, and entering the house carefully dressed, walked proudly to the head of the Treasury bench, and took his seat as dignified and dumb as a statue. Fox was burly and jovial, entered the House in a slouched hat and with a careless air, and as he approached the opposite benches, had a nod for this learned city member, and a joke for that wealthy knight of the shire, and sat down, as much at ease as if he were lounging in the back parlour of a country inn. Pitt, as the adage runs, could "speak a King's speech off-hand," so consecutive were his sentences; and his round, smooth periods delighted the aristocracy of all parties. Fox made the Lords of the Treasury quail, as he declaimed in piercing tones against ministerial corruption, while his friends shouted "hear, hear!" and applauded to the House shook.

Pitt's sentences were pompous and sonorious, and often "their sound revealed their own hallowness."

Fox uttered sturdy Anglo-Saxon sense; every word pregnant with meaning. Pitt was a thorough business man, and relied for success in debate upon careful preparation. Fox despised the drudgery of the office, and relied upon his intuitive perceptions and his robust strength. Pitt was the greater Secretary. Fox the greater Commoner. Pitt's oratory was like the frozen stalactites and pyramids which glitter around Niagara in mid-winter, stately, clear, and cold. Fox's like the vehement waters which sweep over its brink, and roar and boil in the abyss below. Pitt, in his great efforts, only erected himself more proudly, and uttered more full Johnsonion sentences, sprinkling his dignified but monotonous "state paper style" with pungent sarcasms, speaking as one having authority, and commanding that it might stand fast. Fox on such occasions reasoned from first principles, denouncing where he could not persuade, and reeling under his great thoughts, until his excited feeling rocked him like the ocean in the storm.

Pitt displayed the most rhetoric, and his mellow voice charmed like the notes of an organ. Fox displayed the most argument, and his shrill notes pierced like arrows. Pitt had an icy taste; Fox a fiery logic. Pitt had art; Fox nature. Pitt was dignified, cool, cautious. Fox manly, generous, brave. Pitt had a mind. Fox a soul. Pitt was a majestic automaton. Fox a living man. Pitt was a minister of the King. Fox the champion of the people. Both were the early advocates of Parliamentary Reform: but Pitt retreated while Fox advanced: and both joined in denouncing and abolishing the horrors of the passage. Both died the same year, and they sleep side by side in Westminster Abbey, their dust mingled with that of their mutual friend, Wilberforce; while over their tomb watches with eagle eye and extended arm the moulded form of Chatham.—Stanton's Reforms and Reformers of England.

Interesting from South America.

By a letter from John G. Willis, U. S. Consul at Loando, southwest coast of Africa, to a friend in Salem, we have some interesting information concerning an interior exploration of that portion of Africa, to the following effect:

On the first of June Dr. Livingston, of England, arrived at Loando, all the way from the Cape of Good Hope, through the centre of Africa. He started from one of the missions in the vicinity of the Cape, about twenty-seven months before, and had been given up for lost, as no news of him had been received. He describes the interior as very pleasant, and with a good climate, the land being high.

His route was north until he got into the altitude of Loando, when he shaped his course for that place. A short time after so doing he found the height of land was decreasing—so much so that in a few days he descended two thousand feet. His health was good until he commenced nearing the coast, after which he was unwell a great part of the time. Up to the 7th of June (the date of the letter) he was confined to the house, but was improving every day.

Dr. Livingston brought to Loando twenty-seven negroes, who were given to him as a "guard" by one of the chiefs in the interior, and his intention is to return to the Cape by land—partly to endeavor to make further discoveries, and partly to return the negroes.

For many days he was in a forest, so dense that the light of day could hardly be discerned, and he was obliged to set the guard to work cutting down the trees, so that he could see the stars to take an observation. He started with many cattle, but lost all by flies. He was obliged for many days to live on the fruit of some of the trees, which fruit resembled the gourd. He has the latitude and longitude of every place of importance that he has seen; but as regards the country being a second edition of California or Australia, he does not say much.

He was attacked by wild beasts only once during the route. That encounter was with a lion, which, as soon as he got the doctor's arm between his teeth, was wounded by one of the guard. The lion immediately left the doctor and attacked the guard, wounding one in the leg and another in the arm, but after his third spring he fell down and died.

Dr. Livingston was not much more fortunate in his intercourse with the natives, some of whom, as he approached the coast, took all his clothes, with the exception of a single very necessary garment; and he was obliged to use all his influence and make a great many promises, in order to retain that.

In the interior, where a white man had, probably, never been before, he was received by the different chiefs in great state, and was offered much hospitality. He speaks the language of the natives of the interior, which is entirely different from that of those about Loando.

It is understood that a report of his travels will be forwarded to the Geographical Society of London, as soon as an opportunity offers and the doctor is able to put his notes in a proper shape.—Salem Register.

From the National Era.

The Amalgamation of Races.

"The Southern States, since their earliest colonial history, have been peopled by two races, of different color and of different civilization. We hold them in bondage, because we are unwilling to amalgamate with them, and desire to keep our Teutonic blood pure and uncorrupted by any baser admixture, because we prefer that their untutored labor should be directed by the superior intelligence of our race to useful industry, rather than that they should be freed from all wholesome restraint, and left without coercion to pollute our blood and destroy our progress. It is not within our comprehension to divine the cause which has made the Ruler of Nations establish this order of things."

The above is a paragraph of the Hon. Mr. Preston's answer to Gerrit Smith's remarks upon Slavery, in the discussion on the Koszta question, on the 20th of December last. Mr. Preston was, no doubt, in earnest, when he uttered these sentiments; and yet, one acquainted with the true state of the case can hardly help believing that his language was purely ironical. Salvery perpetuated in the South, to preserve the pure Teutonic blood unmixed with the African race! And does not Mr. Preston know that it is this amalgamation of the two races, so rapidly progressing in the slave States, with its consequent moral degradation, that makes Slavery so abhorrent to all unprejudiced and correct minds? I have travelled more or less through all the slave States, with the exception of Florida and Texas, and have no hesitation in saying that there are 100 mulatto children born in the South, to one in the North, among the same number of blacks. In many places in the South, it is not even disreputable for white men of wealth, if not of standing, to keep colored mistresses, and raise families by them. Such a thing in unknown in the North. I have lived in one place, in Ohio, for fifty years, where, during all that time, there have been a number of colored persons; and in that fifty years I have heard of but three children with colored mothers and white fathers—that is, mulattoes. I do not, however, include in this estimate children of mulattoes married together, and having children of like color. There were some of these, but in every instance except a few more recent cases, these mulatto parents came from slave States. A few have married with each other here, but their parents were from the same fruitful source of amalgamation.

Again: I have known, in the county in which I have lived, at least six families of mulattoes brought here from slave States, by their white fathers and masters, with the avowed purpose of enabling them to obtain an education, which was prohibited in the South; and at this time, I know a colored lady here, the daughter of a late member of Congress from the South, of high standing and talent, and who for years, while in Congress, looked to that daughter for a supply of those articles of gentlemen's dress which few could furnish, so exquisite is her use of the needle.

If any one will travel from city to city in the South—from New Orleans to Baltimore, as I have done—he will be struck with the immense numbers of colored persons, of all shades, from the mulatto to the quarteroon, and even lighter, and the very few purely black young persons. In country places, amalgamation does not go on so rapidly and generally, though even on plantations you will occasionally find a planter living with his slaves, without any white woman, and raising children by them, as regularly as if legally married. These are facts which no one who is acquainted with the South can deny—and yet Slavery is relied on as the means of preserving the purity of the Teutonic blood, and preventing the amalgamation of the white and black races! With the known facts, of which Mr. Preston could not be ignorant, how could he expect any one to believe him? Slavery is the great amalgamator, which, if perpetuated a few centuries, will so mix the races in the Southern States, that purity of Teutonic blood will not be capable of determination in a vast portion of the people. Already there have been cases, as Mr. Preston must know, where mistakes have been made.* No trace of color led to these detections, but simply personal identity. If in one century the color of the races have been so mixed, as in many cases already to be incapable of determination, what will the next century produce in a race already so whitened? Those opposed to amalgamation should consider these facts when they at the same time advocate slavery. The result I do not predict, but it promises anything else but the perpetuation of Slavery, or the preservation of the pure Teutocic blood in the sunny South.

HUMANITAS.

* But a short time since, a whole family was apprehended in New Albany, directly across the Ohio from Mr. Preston's residence, and claimed as fugitives from labor, under the act of 1850, when all of them were so white as to defy detection in any other way than by a knowledge of their persons, and that they were held as slaves by some probably much darker-skinned slaveholder. The citizens of Louisville, aided, no doubt, by Mr. Preston himself, generously raised money to pay the owner for this family, and thus emancipated them.

A more melancholy case occurred since, in New Orleans, where a young man, of high prospects, married a beautiful, accomplished, and educated young lady, the daughter of a wealthy gentleman of that city, and by the husband supposed to be the child of a white wife. On learning, through her nurses, perhaps, that she was the daughter of the father's colored mistress, he first killed her, and then took his own life. Such mistakes are frequent already in the South, and are increasing in the ratio of a purely arithmetical progression.

Miss Martineau on Kossuth.

The Kossuth and Sanders correspondence, to which I called your attention last week, has produced a magnificent letter, in the Daily News, from (I have no doubt) Miss Martineau, who employs the nom de guerre of a "A Republican." She exposes with the faithfulness of an Apostle the immorality of Kossuth's non-interference doctrine, and, with the skill of a true logician, she utterly demolishes his weak and insincere arguments.

"It is remarkable," says she, "that Kossuth does not appear to see as Mazzini does, that the owners of men can never be effectual champions of Human Freedom. * * * Now, M. Kossuth may write to the Americans that he will not recoguize any divisions, but not the less, publicly, do these divisions exist. He may say that he looks to the brotherhood of the whole people as an undivided body of sincere Republicans, but he will not make one man on earth forget that there is a whole race within the bounds of that Repuplic who are held in no brotherhood at all; and that some of these 'sincere Republicans,' while advocating the rights of free thought over brute obedience in Europe, are enforcing that 'brute obedience,' at all risks, in America. No; this infidelity to principle and truth is not the way to advance the cause of liberty anywhere, or under any circumstances. To perceive and tell the truth, and to sympathise with the genuine Republicans, instead of insulting by ignoring them, is the only way to serve the good cause either in Europe or America."

There is some good talk for you. I wonder how that precious Republican, Mr. Sanders, liked it. He is quite silent.

AN AFFECTIONATE SPIRIT.—We sometimes meet with men who seem to think that any indulgence in an affectionate feeling is weakness. They will return from a journey, and greet their families with a distant dignity, and move among their children with the cold and lofty splendor of an ice-berg, surrounded by its broken fragments. There is hardly a more unnatural sound on earth than one of the families without a heart.

A father had better extinguish his boy's eyes than to take away his heart. Who that has ever experienced the joys of friendship, and knows the worth of sympathy and affection, would not rather lose all that is beautiful in nature's scenery, than be robbed of the hidden treasures of his heart? Who would not rather bury his wife than bury his love for her? Who would not rather follow his child to the grave than entomb his parental affection?

Cherish, then, your heart's best affections. Indulge in the warm and gushing emotions of filial, parental, and faithful love. Think it not a weakness. God is love. Love God. Love everybody and everything that is lovely. Teach your children to love—to love the rose, the robin; to love their parents; to love God. Let it be the studied object of their domestic cultures, to give them warm hearts, ardent affection. Bind your whole families together with these strong cords. You cannot make them too numerous. Religion is love—love to God—love to man.

Dr. Edward Beecheer, in a lecture before the American Teachers's Institute, at its recent meeting at Providence, uttered a noble sentiment, which is thus reported by a correspondent of the Post. It conveys a lesson which every parent and every teacher should heed:—

"It is of the hightest importance to treat with respect the sense of justice in a child. In my experience as committeeman, I have often known the teacher to be wrong and the scholar to be right. I would say to the teacher, always respect the sense of justice in a pupil. It is better that a teacher should make twenty acknowledgments of error, before the whole school, than that the sense of justice in the smallest pupil should be outraged in a single instance."

FARMS AND FARMERS.—Farms occupy two-thirds of the land of Engand. The number of the farms is 225,318; the average size is 111 acres. Two-thirds of the farms are under that size, but there are 771 of above 1,000 acres. The large holdings abound in the south-eastern anb eastern counties; the small farms in the north. There are 2,000 English farmers holding nearly 2,000,000 acres; and there are 97,000 English farmers not holding more. There are 40,650 farmers who employ five labourers each 16,601 have ten or more, and employ together 311,607 labourers; 170 farmers have above 60 laborers each, and together employ 17,000.—Census Report.

LONGEVITY.—A. Drew, Esq., of Durham. N. H., is now living, and enjoying as good health as usual, at the advanced age of 100 years and 5 months. His head is as free from grey hair as when but twenty years old. Mr. D. had a wife and two sisters: his wife died at the age of 95 years; one of the sisters is now living at the advanced age of 103 years, the other died at the age of 95. Mr. Drew lived with his wife 76 years, and has always enjoyed good health. For 76 years he did not fail to be present at the annual town meeting. Several inquiries was made as to his manner of living, from which we learn he has always been industrious, rose early in the morning, managed his own farming affairs, and meddled with no man's business but his own. What seems most remarkable is that two families connected by marriage should live to so advanced an age unless special care had been taken to preserve health.

A DEEP SPRING.—On Lake Prairie Iowa, there is a spring, the bottom of which no plummet has ever yet sounded. It has a false bottom about three feet from its surface, through which, if a heavy twenty, foot pole be thrust, it will sink under the sand composing this crust-like layer, and in a moment after its disappearance, will bound up again on the surface. An Indian legend has it, that on a quiet, full-moon night, the Great Spirit led the wicked ones of a certain tribe thither, and when they saw the glorious beauty of the crystal water, they thought to bathe themselves in the moon-kissed fountain, and therefore plunged into the spring, but sunk to rise no more. Ever afterwards, runs the story, the manes of these evil unfortunates have troubled the bottomless waters; and to this day they agitate the deceptive bosom of the beautiful though dangerous spring.

SINGULAR CALCULATION.—An English paper tells us that there is less risk of the loss of life in the battle-field, or in storming a fortress, than if a person worked in an undrained street, and slept in a crowded, ill-ventilated dwelling. The chance of life was, at the siege of Flushing, 550 to 1; the siege of Antwerp, 68 to 1; siege of Bajajos, 44 to 1; battle of Waterloo, 40 to 1; while Shop-keeping in Liverpool it has been found is 19 to 1; and Saw-making in Sheffield, 4 to 1!

PAPER FROM THE PLANTAIN.—We see it stated, on the authority of the Demerara Royal Gazette, that paper of a good quality has been successfully manufactured in that region from the plantain, whose spontaneous growth in almost every country renders it a cheap substitute for the articles at present used.

A distinguished physician of Paris, Dr. Robert de Lambelle, announces that a shock of electricity, given to a patient dying from effects of chloroform, immediately counteracts its influence and restores the sufferer to life.

RYE AMONG CORN.—Those persons wishing to follow a crop of corn with rye, will find it a pleasant way to sow the seed on a flat hoeing, and harrow both ways between the rows with a suitable implement, or rake in, which may be done rapidly.

St. Peter's Church, Rome, will accommodate 54,000 persons; Milan Cathedral, 37,000; St. Paul's, Rome, 32,000; St. Paul's, London, 25,000; St. Petronia, Bologna, 24,000; St. Sophia's, Constantinople, 23,000; Florence Cathedral, 24,000; Notre Dame, 21,000.

Thackery, it is said, has again taken his place among the witty and humorous phalanx attached to our pleasant friend Punch, under the title of "Bashi-Bazouk."

The Portland State of Maine says:—A heavy item to bear down the price of flour, is the splendid wheat crop of Canada. It is calculated that the surplus, for export, will be twelve millions of bushels, five millions more than last year. The crop in the United States at the south and west promises well, and will be much larger than last year.

EXTRAORDINARY PISTOL.—The London correspondent of the Boston Traveller writes thus: "I have just been shown a rifle pistol, invented by an English gentleman, residing at Ratisbon, and which is destined to make as great a revolution in that arm as the Minie rifle in musketry. It can kill at 500 yards. Last week it was tested before experienced officers at Woolwich, and completely stood the trial. Since then it has been exhibited to Prince Albert, and from my own observation, I can vouch for the efficiency of this extraordinary weapon. It is easily charged, and has sights regulated at 200, 300, 400, yards. It is, besides, light and beautiful—Only fancy a revolver of this description with six or eight barrels, a good marksman, and an adversary a quarter of a mile off. The whole depends on the rifle grove."

WHAT IT COST TO STOP THE PAPER.—One of our subscribers stopped his paper for six months, last year, because we advertised so much. In the meantime, his farm was advertised for non-payment of taxes, and sold. On discovering the difficulty, it cost him one or two days' travel with horse and buggy, and ten per cent. of the taxes, to say nothing of the vexation, to redeem it. How much did he gain by stopping his paper? He came back and subscribed again.—Ogdensburg Sentinel.

WHAT LONDON IS.—London, which extends its intellectual, if not its topographical identity from Bethnal-green to Turnhamgreen, (ten miles), from Kentish-town to Brixton, (7 miles), whose houses are said to number upwards of 200,000, and to occupy twenty square miles of ground, has a population of not less than 2,000,000 of souls. Its leviathan body is composed of nearly 10,000 streets, lanes, alleys, squares, places, terraces, &c. It consumes upwards of 4,369,000 lbs. of animal food weekly, which is washed down by 1,400,000 barrels of beer annually, exclusive of other liquids. Its rental is £7,000,000 a-year, and it pays for the luxuries it imports at least £12,000,000 a-year, duty alone. It has 537 churches, 207 Dissenting places of worship, upwards of 5,000 public-houses, and sixteen theatres.

CUBAN SLAVE TRADE.—The Captain General of Cuba has paid Don Manuel Christobl De Searjas the sum of $1,284 for apprehending in the Mariel district 174 newly landed negroes—being at the rate of $10 each for males, $6 for females, and $3 for children. This payment will doubtless have a beneficial effect in assisting the suppression of the slave trade.

SANDWICH ISLANDS.—A letter from one of the Ministers of the King of these islands, addressed to a naval officer, dated September 9th, states that Mr. Judd, Minister of Finance, was dismissed from office, partly in consequence of his having been detected in speculations, which had brought down upon him the indignation of the people; but the more immediate cause of his dismissal was the conclusive evidence against him of a negotiation which he had carried on for the sale of the islands, King and all, to a speculator of New York, for five millions of dollars.

"MORE CHINESE.—Captain Folger, of the barque George E. Webster, from Hong Kong, reports that there were fifteen ships and barques bound for this port, in ballast and with passengers, at that port. They would bring about 10,000 Chinese. One ship, the B. Horsmugee, had over 2,000 on board. Old ships, sold here some time since for $4,000 and $5,000, were sold at that place for $50,000, and loading with passengers for California."—San Francisco Eve. Journal.

NEW EXPLOSIVE POWER.—A keg of yeast was brought in yesterday, from Albany, by the National Express Company, whose office is in Place d'Armes. The keg, which was very strongly made and iron-bound, was placed on end among other freight in the office. It had not been long in this position when it suddenly (to the no small astonishment of the clerks and messengers) exploded, scattering its contents in every direction, and driving the keg through the ceiling, breaking in its course a four-inch scantling. The laths and plaster were cut out by the keg as clearly as if by a cannon shot. Had the explosion taken place while the keg was being handled, the consequences might have been serious.—Montreal Herald.

Crown Lands.

For the purpose of supplying, as far as we can, at present, information respecting the location, terms of settlement, &c., of Crown Lands, in good localities, extracts have been made from the Official Gazette, in the present number of this paper. We would like to give direct intelligence of the lands in Kent and that section of the Province, and hope to be able to do so in a few days. In the absence of some interesting particulars, we hope to give in future, we can say from what we know to be reliable information, that Crown Lands have been sold, near Chatham, within the past week, to parties hereabouts. There are excellent lands within a few hours' travel of this city also, that can be had by paying from £3 15s. to £5 down, and the balance in 9 years, with interest. Besides the great quantity of land to be sold at Chatham in October next, for taxes, there are many thousands of acres in possession of Land Agents in this city, as elsewhere in the Province. Seven thousand acres located in the county of Simcoe, may now be had by one purchaser, if desirable, at £1 an acre, to be paid for in three instalments. Should there be any difficulty about getting Crown Lands from the agents, in any particular district,—as at Chatham, for instance, it would be well to bear in mind that emigrants are fast settling the lands in every part of the Upper Province, and that at Sarnia, Goderich, and other thriving towns, agents reside, to whom they can apply. Should the names of the parties wishing to purchase be sent to this office, together with the name of the district to be settled, with a statement of the sum they can command for present payment, &c., measures will at once be taken to secure to them a homestead. Colored emigrants make application for lands to agents west, and in many instances they receive for their answer, there are no lands to dispose of, when, at the same time, other foreigners can, and do, effect a purchase without difficulty. Such a state of things should be remedied. Many worthy families who could pay an instalment, are thus deprived of a home, at the caprice of some petty official who has no higher motive for such disregard of his duties, than the desire to settle the country with a "homogeneous" population; a fruitful source of vice and crime is thus created by indirectly reducing to the level of paupers, with, in their case, no hope of a speedy change in their pecuniary condition, the very men who, under ordinary circumstances, make useful subjects. We hope the attention of those in high authority will be called to this subject, and in the meantime, that discouragements met at Chatham, in their attempts to get Crown Lands, will not deter them from making immediate application at Toronto and other places, either individually or by an agent of their own. Why not select a person of known shrewdness and honesty as an agent or agents, to attend to settling emigrants? A small percentage from each purchaser would be amply sufficient to support a person who would devote his time to the business, now that so many desire land. Should this suggestion meet with favor, we will cheerfully refer our people to at least two men of well-known ability and integrity, whose services they might secure.

Church of England Mission to the Colored People of Canada.

Having seen an announcement in the city papers, that the Rev. M. M. Dillon, recently from England, and formerly a resident of Jamaica, W. I., was here by appointment of the Colonial Church and School Society of the Church of England, on a special mission to the "negroes," and having learned more directly that a meeting would be held by the Rev. gentleman at the Sayer Street Chapel, we attended, and also sought by another and less public interview, to ascertain the special objects to be accomplished. And here, before any further palaver, we might as well confess it, that notwithstanding the independent character of the Freeman on religious subjects, so far as our private opinion is concerned, we went to the meeting, at least, prepossessed in favor of a Church of England Mission that would include persons without regard to color, and one without the name of color as to our mind a desideratum for the Provinces. The Rev. gentleman stated his plan and intentions, with great force, precision and clearness, though we trust to be pardoned, if we give the impression on others as well as on ourselves, as to other features in the manner of the same. A greater display of haughtiness, a more thorough contempt for the opinions of the parties to be attended to, who, after all, had the work to do, we do not ever remember to have seen depicted by countenance or gesture; certainly not under like circumstances. We were sorry for that, for whether habitual or intentional, it does not tend to render too tractable those to be "trained," in any case, and especially in this. The particular object, so far as we then and there ascertained, was, by aid of a Normal School, to train preachers and teachers among the colored people, who might in the Providence of God desire to carry Christianity to AFRICA, at the same time, that a religious, though not sectarian, education is to be given to them, and such whites as might be induced to go.

The audience were told of the great people connected with the work—of the colored women, and the "merchant teacher" who had offered up their future lives on this African altar (?)—that, after all, the colored men here must do the work—an anecdote about the power of prayer on some slaveholders was also told, which, though we do not design to be incredulous or irreverent, did appear to us, from the current opinion of a slaveholder's conscience, to be a pocket impression only. After a few questions and some speeches from the audience, a show of hands—heads not being necessary, as before implied, was made.

To further carry out the intention, the Normal School is to be opened at Toronto or some other point, as the nucleus of extensive operations.

In a private interview we were emboldened to make, from a general invitation given to those who desired to get at facts, we were told to our surprise, after reading the "Occasional paper" entitled, "Mission to the Free Colored Population of Canada," and after a statement to the contrary at the meeting, that it was not a mission to the colored people in this instance—that there was no desire particularly to have people become teachers for Africa. That the colored people could not be expected to know what was best for them in their present state—that the prejudice in the schools here made a school of the sort necessary. That as their origin was African (?) they here and in Africa, and elsewhere, had African sympathies generally.

Her Majesty, the Earl of Shaftsbury, and the Duchess of Sutherland, are said to be interested; which they no doubt are, in the Colonial Society generally; but we look in vain for their countenance, particularly to the "Colored Mission" in the paper circulated among the Colored people. And here allow us to state that the Report of the Church and School Society, a book put into our hands by Mr. Dillon, and which he informs us, it seems, has no connexion with the "Colored" Mission, does not contain information on the point likely to advance the Canada scheme. We think our people should not be ready to show hands even, upon any matter vitally affecting them, without first understanding it. And in this particular instance, we would say to our people West, as well as here, move cautiously in the matter, as you may do something now, you will see cause to regret in after years. The little book circulated here, was denied by the Rev. gentleman to us—so it seems there are either books for two classes, or there is not an understanding between master and man. Should the plan meet the views of our people, and, really, as we understand it, we hope it will not, keep your children and selves away from the "Colored" African School, and the plan must fall.

We shall examine this subject more fully next week, and give such copious extracts from the big book, and other matter, as will, we think, convince our readers that not only will this mission not be wanted by Canadians, but that Mr. Dillon's former field of labors is in much greater need of his efforts.

The time for receiving petitions for private or local bills at the ensuing session of parliament, will expire on the twentieth of September for the House of Assembly, and on the tenth of October for the Legislative Council.

From the A. M. E. Recorder.

Our General Agent.

What has become of Rev. William H. Jones, our Travelling General Agent? We have seen and heard nothing from him since July 4th. He was at that time in the city of Buffalo, from which point he sent us a communication, in which he said to us, "You shall hear from me weekly, hereafter."

This language to us was most cheering. We hastened to lay his correspondence before the people, particularly our regular subscribers. We felt it to be due to them; and also we deemed it to be doing, at the same time, an act of justice to our brother the Agent. But we are now somewhat mortified at being under the necessity of saying, that although more than a whole month has passed away since that time, we have heard nothing from our good brother Jones.

In addition to all this, we have further to say, that we have not received a penny by way of subscription, or otherwise, from our agent, toward the support of the paper or any other department of the Book Concern, since the Philadelphia Annual Conference in May last.

We may further add, upon the authority of the committee, that they did not receive, at that time, all the moneys which were in his hands, due to the Concern, according to his own showing. This, however, we pass by, with a bare statement of the fact, without attaching blame to brother Jones, more than the committee, until we have heard his own version of that matter. We are certainly unwilling to find fault with the Agent; and if we could, we would avoid so doing. But otherwise, what are we to do? How can we avoid the matter, and at the same time be ourselves justified in the eyes of the community?

If the people are paying to him the amount of their subscriptions in advance, they are looking for us to send them the paper. But we cannot send them the paper, until the agent sends to us their names, and the amount of their subscriptions that they have paid to him, to enable us to issue our publication. More than this, unless we receive the necessary aid, we must discontinue our issues. The agent knows this to be true. And he knows more than this—he knows that it is to his agency that we look for our means of support for the paper, in the direction of gathering funds toward defraying the necessary expense of publication. He knows the agency to be the principal channel through which we expect our aid to come. And with all this information, he knows that we have not received a single dollar from him towards the re-publication of the paper, though we have published three numbers, at a considerable expense, as he must know.

In the name of the Committee, we most respectfully request that the General Agent will have the goodness to let us hear from him; and that he will forward to us, forthwith, whatever moneys may be in his hands for us, as we stand in need of them. Send us your means, brother, and the paper shall go on, if they are sufficient to support it—otherwise, without means, ready means, to pay as we go, we shall have to suspend the paper, as we will make no attempt again to involve the concern in additional indebtedness in this particular direction.

The Committee mean and intend no unkindness towards the Agent; neither do they wish, by anything that they have said in this article, to destroy public confidence in him. They only wish to let him and the subscribers know the peculiar situation of the Editor and

PUBLISHING COMMITTEE.

REMARKS.

It will be seen by the above extract from the A. M. E. Recorder, that Rev. W. A. Jones, their chief agent, has not reported up to that time since May last. The patrons of that paper are not the only ones who have just cause of complaint against Mr. Jones.

It would be quite as satisfactory to us to receive sums due this establishment from him, and which should have been paid long ago.

Mr. Jones entered into an understanding with us to act as agent for this paper; but did not, it seems, feel bound by the moral obligations resting upon him, to make returns, as he proposed to do—in fact, would not settle with us at all. Such conduct on the part of agents is calculated to destroy any enterprise, whether intended or not. We suppose him to be superintending some building operations, at present, in the west, as he signified his intention to do so. In addition to other matters, there is a debt of several pounds due this office from him, besides the amount of his shares, that would be very opportune just now.

The extracts below, from the correspondence of an English exchange, is well worthy the attention of many of our friends in the States, who are desirous of bettering their condition, but are detained from coming to Canada from the "mistaken notions" which they have acquired in regard to the state of affairs here:—

"I would that our friends in England, some of whom make their continental tours almost annually, would make a tour through Canada, especially Western Canada, once in their life time. They are little aware of the excellent country that lies within a fortnight's journey of their own goodly land. I have travelled as extensively, as attention to my other duties would allow, since I came to Canada, and all I see only goes to excite my gratitude to the Giver of all good for having put such an excellent country under the British authority.

"Hundreds in Canada who are now blessed with abundance of this world's goods can well remember when they had but little to call their own. Persons who are of sober industrious habits, cannot fail, with the blessing of God, to attain to a respectable and honourable position in society. Many are the times I have wished that a few hundreds of the hard-working, ill-paid, and poorly fed sons of toil, whom I have seen in my fatherland, were scattered through this province; for here, thank God, we have enough and to spare, and we will give all who come a hearty welcome.

I am certain that there are many mistaken notions in England respecting Canada. You suppose that in summer we are almost burned with heat, while in winter we are almost frozen to death; but I assure you that neither the heat of summer nor the intense cold of winter, is so bad to endure as you would at first imagine. By dressing according to the climate, both seasons are much more pleasant than I anticipated. The changes in the weather are frequently most extreme, and remarkably sudden; but persons are not, generally speaking, much affected thereby, if they are regular in their manner of living, and abstain from those things which are injurious to health. The heat of summer has great effect upon weakly children; but there are not so many cases of death among children as there used to be.

The country, at present, is in a state of great prosperity, and great demands are made for persons of all classes, but more particularly mechanics of all descriptions and agricultural labourers. The rate of wages is indeed enormous; the man with his pick and shovel can earn his 5s. 7½d. per day, and will not strike a blow under that sum; bricklayers, stonecutters, carpenters, and joiners, are all receiving 10s., and some of them even more per day; other trades receive remuneration in an equal proportionate manner.

I must, however, admit that, in the cities, the rate at which almost every article sells is a drawback upon those whose incomes are below the above, such, for instance, as clerks in stores, &c., and some ministers of the Gospel; the majority, however, of all classes receive an increase of salary when the prices of household requisites rose. As a matter of course, people live cheapest in the country, where the comforts of life are equally abundant, but the religious privileges are fewer, as in all countries this must be the case, than in cities.

Provincial Exhibition.

A correspondent of a city cotemporary in reference to the approaching Exhibition, at London, commencing on the 28th instant, says:—

"The grounds selected are extensive and admirably adapted for the purpose. They are situated a little to the North of the business part of the town, and comprise twenty-eight acres of land with such a gentle declivity as will prevent water from collecting thereon. A stream runs through the northern portion of the enclosure, and a dam of very large dimensions has been constructed, well suited for boating purposes. The banks of this lake, as it may be called, are planted with trees, thus securing a cool retreat for those who are tired with the business part of the Show. The Grounds are enclosed with a fence, ten feet in height, which is to be ornamented with flags and evergreens. The principal entrance will be through a lofty arch on Sarnia Street, in front of which, in the grounds, will be a fountain jetting up its cooling water, refreshing the dusty traveller by its very appearance.

"The Floral Hall will stand at the South side of the field, and the Committee are resolved to make it one every way befitting the interesting occasion. Other buildings are contemplated for the reception of Furniture and other goods, while along the East side of the enclosure a row of sheds is ready for cattle, &c. Large saloons too will be built for the accommodation of visitors, where the Committee will secure order and regularity, a large number of special Constables having been appointed for this purpose. Bands of music will be located in different places through the grounds, and the best musicians in the United States and in Canada are expected to be present. The town Council have granted $1,000 to the Fire Brigade, so that they may make a creditable appearance and entertain their guests from other places hospitably. A grand torch-light procession is to come off on the first evening of the Exhibition, and in this it is expected that the Firemen from Hamilton and other places will join. The Inn-keepers are making great preparations to accommodate, but in case there should be a deficit of room in London, the Committee have arranged with the Great Western Railroad to carry passengers, for a small charge to Ingorsoll, Woodstock, and the neighbouring towns, to stop over night. Concerts are to come off on the second and third evenings, and these are to be under the management of a skilful musician, who is instructed to spare no expense in making them of the first quality. It is said that certain gentlemen have contributed no less than $1,000 to get up a Mammoth Ball, to take place the last night of the Exhibition, in a spacious Room on York Street, granted for the occasion by E. Leonard, Esq., and which will doubtless be one of the grandest events on this interesting occasion. Another large subscription is in the hands of the Committee, to be expended in procuring Daguerreotype views of the prize cattle, and of different articles in the exhibition to be sent to the London Illustrated News.

A Meeting among the Colored People—Rev. M. M. Dillon's Special Mission—Colored Normal School—The grand object to train Teachers for Africa.

TORONTO, Sept. 13, 1854.

DEAR MADAM,—Being on a visit to your city, I last evening attended the meeting called by the Rev. Mr. Dillon, and held, as announced in the Sayer Street Chapel. I went, as I suppose was the case with the large number out, anticipating something new, and in that was not disappointed. After giving his ideas of Religion, Mr Dillon informed us that he was sent out from England, by the Colonial Church and School Society on a special Mission to the Colored People; that he intended establishing a Normal School where Teachers would be trained, so that a constant supply could be on hand, at all times, for any station necessary but more especially for the purpose of carrying light to the benighted millions in Africa; that although a Mission to the Colored People, Whites would not be excluded from the Normal School, nor from others that might be established. He stated also, that the plan had originated with himself, and that he intended carrying it out regardless of the opinions of the few. (They being the Colored People I suppose.) But that the work of our elevation belonged to ourselves, for that the white man could not do it.

Now although having been told very distinctly, that our opinions, though averse to the movement would not be regarded, —we at the same time having the work to do,—I shall venture to give my opinion for the benefit of my brethren. In the first place, I would like to know why a special Mission is necessary, why not come as Missionary to Canadians? For in those localities where Missionaries are most needed, the whites stand as much in need of religious instruction as the colored, and where churches and ministers are numerous, the colored people are as well cared for as their white brethren. But, as before stated, Mr. Dillon told us that there would be no complexional features; and yet it was a Colored Mission, how these two points can be reconciled, remains to be explained.

Secondly, the Normal School. Is there not a Normal School already established here, at which colored students will be admitted with pleasure, if qualified to pass the slight examination necessary? The fact is known to all; and also that there are always vacancies.

The common schools also are open to all, in the large towns, and wherever the large towns takes the precedence in matters of the kind, the smaller ones generally follow suit. So far from being needed, the establishment of a Normal School, of the kind proposed, would be a positive injury; for the term colored, prefixed to either church or school, tends to produce prejudice against color, the very state of affairs that missionary labors should obviate. Finally, the idea of educating teachers, and raising up a ministry, whose attention will be constantly directed to Africa as the field most needing laborers, is in my opinion as preposterous, as is the coming of Mr. Dillon from the West Indies, where, according to the Seventeenth Annual Report of the Society, with which he is connected, a copy of which has been handed me by a friend—the number of Missionary laborers should be greatly increased, instead of diminished,—on a Mission to the Free Colored Population in Canada, who receive religious instruction in common with the rest of Her Majesty's subjects.
